Butterfield booted

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts evicted 134 residents of Butterfield Dormitory and canceled the Butterfield Dining program in June, following a May 25 spree of vandalism and destruction of property in the building.

Housing Services disbanded the community on June 11 in a letter sent to all returning residents of the building by Director Michael Gilbert. Citing "ongoing episodes of dangerous behavior. . . coupled with frequent incidents of rowdy and destructive activity" Gilbert decided that there was a "need to develop a new and more positive focus for Butterfield's future."

The move comes after a series of incidents in and around the building, starting with problems at last fall semester's Butterfield Banquet, an end-of-the-year celebration sponsored by the Butterfield House Council.

The Banquet, which includes a dinner, show and dance, was frequently followed by an after-party.

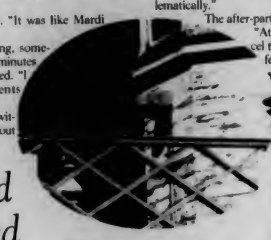
"It was so crowded," Gilbert said. "It was like Mardi Gras."

"About one o'clock in the morning, somebody pulled a fire alarm. It took us 45 minutes to clear the building," Gilbert explained. "I think there were high school students there."

Gilbert says that the incidents he witnessed caused him to be concerned about the building, and led him to impose restrictions on the next Banquet.

On March 27, Gilbert and Housing officials trekked up the hill to discuss these restrictions and his "concerns" with Butterfield residents. Gilbert laid out the conditions under which the next banquet would be held. Guests were to be allowed to the show and dinner only, and no guest would be allowed to stay in the residential portion of the building over night, and there would be no access to the show area from the residential area. Residents wishing to return to their rooms during the show had to leave through the back door and enter the front door, which was monitored by security. Only Butterfield residents were allowed in the front door. The meeting, held at a dinner in Butterfield's dining area, was met with a response that Gilbert describes as "ballistic."

The incidents of vandalism increased after that, Gilbert says.



"The more forceful we became," Gilbert said, "the more problematic the behavior became."

Gilbert was quick to clarify that "not all students behaved problematically."

The after-party was also cancelled.

"At the end of the semester, we decided to cancel the after-hours event after the Banquet. We felt that the event the year before had attracted too many people, creating all sorts of potentially dangerous situations," Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier

SGA wanted to be involved

Of all the groups affected by the mess in Upper Central, few are more outraged at the administration than the Student Government Association, leveling allegations of stonewalling and outright lies from the University Administration.

Members of the SGA were made aware of the decision to close Butterfield in early July. Following the announcement the organization released a statement charging that Housing's decisions regarding the displacement of the Butterfield residents "oversteps its bounds."

Kitchen closes after 60 years

Lost in the aftermath of the closing of Butterfield is the end of a lost tradition: The kitchen in Butterfield dormitory has closed down after 60 years of operation. Eighty student-employees are out of jobs this semester.

The decision to reprogram the building, and ultimately close the kitchen, came from Director of Housing Services Michael Gilbert at the beginning of the summer. Along with Director of Residential Academic Programs (RAP) Joe Batista and Interim Dean of the Commonwealth College Linda Slakey, Gilbert felt it would be best for "first year students to take their meals

Construction continues across campus

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

Whether a student is returning to UMass or beginning their freshman year, almost everyone on campus will be affected by the construction and renovation that has taken place this summer and that continues into the fall.

Maintenance, construction and landscaping crews have been hard at work all summer. The largest and most obvious project has been the construction work done on the Isenberg School of Management Harold Alfond addition. However, throughout the rest of campus many more projects have been completed.

One of the construction projects that has been completed is the new steam line in the Orchard Hill residence area. Construction there began last winter and was finished this summer. Replacement of the line is expected to be more energy-efficient and lower utility costs.

According to Tom Weidner, the associate vice chancellor for facilities and campus services, the crews are cleaning up the last of the construction mess, and the new steam line is already working.

"The clean-up is done for all intents and purposes," Weidner said. "The heat is more reliable for the people up there."

Along with the work at Orchard Hill, there have been other improvements to residence halls. The roof was replaced on Mary Lyon, and although there were repairs to roofs of towers and low rises in Southwest, the Northeast building was the only one to receive a complete replacement.

"There are some leaks some of the times in a number of buildings," John Findley, associate director for planning and operations in housing services said. "But the replacement for Mary Lyon cost $250,000, so it's impossible to replace all of the roofs."

In addition to the roof replacement, the exterior of Knowlton was repainted. Flooring was replaced and carpet installed in certain areas of John Quincy Adams, Baker and Moore residence halls. The fire alarm system was replaced in Butterfield. "The work on Butterfield would have happened anyway," Findley said. "It was their time to be replaced and meet code requirements." Some doors and ceilings were replaced or renovated in Butterfield as well.

There were specific improvements to the buildings in Southwest. Coolidge was the recipient of new, modernized elevators and new bathrooms. Many of the low- rise buildings in the area have been worked on. According to Findley, the balconies of some buildings have been closed.

"We are looking at different ways to refigure the walls in those buildings," Findley said. "We've been unable to maintain sliding doors in those balconies and looking for something safer. We're looking for a way to install something with glass panels."

Findley said that there have also been many small projects in which student crews have been working closely with maintenance crews to paint dorm rooms. Besides painting, each of the school's 6,000 rooms has been individually and thoroughly cleaned. All of the small projects have now been completed, and the rooms are ready for students.

As the residence halls have been prepared for move-in day, the rest of campus has also been subject to construction and improvement. For example, the W.E.B. Dubois Library had its fire alarm system replaced. Sprinklers were installed in Herter, Tobin and the Graduate Research Center.

A new parking lot was created near Sylvan, where the old women's tennis courts were located. Many more parking lots near Orchard Hill, the ROTC building, the Lincoln Apartments and the School of Public Health and Health Sciences were all repaved. Work continues on the Lincoln Apartments to remove lead and reinforce the structure of the building.

The lights were replaced on the top of Boyden gym. "Several years ago there were problems with the roof leaking," Weidner said. "We fixed the floor and now we're fixing the lights."

The emergency generator project was completed between South College and the Library. According to Weidner, the telephone system that is used for the Office of Information Technologies is broken up into major nodes and one is underground between South College and

GEO 'sick-out' protest could cost jobs even as grad union signs new contract

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Eight instructors from the Department of Continuing Education face unemployment for the upcoming semester following a 'sick-out' protest that forced the cancellation of a day of summer classes.

According to University of Massachusetts officials, the instructors called in sick on the same day as a protest against both bargaining difficulties and the lack of progress in allowing instructors from the Continuing Education program to become part of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO)/Local 2322 union. The union began negotiations with the University in late February for their upcoming three-year contract. During the process a mediator was brought in to try to help settle major differences between the two sides.

Much of the protest centers on the issue of pay discrepancies between instructors teaching continuing education classes and teaching assistants during the regular school year, GEO Secretary and Treasurer Josh Mason explained.

"When instructors teach in Continuing Education they are not covered by the union and they are paid half of the amount that they are paid during the school year," Mason explained. "They teach the exact same course to the exact same students and get no benefits."

Benjamin Balthaser, a graduate student in the English department who has been teaching English 112, a composition class, for several semesters expressed similar sentiments about the treatment of Continuing Education instructors.

"We do the same job yet we are paid less," he said. "Sometimes we are teaching the exact same course with same syllabus in the same room to the same students yet we are still paid half the amount."

He went on to explain that Continuing Education instructors are not given any health insurance and have no support if they are unjustly fired or punished.

The sick-out came as little surprise to many students attending Continuing Education classes. Several courses were informed early in the semester that the organization intended to stage some form of protest and students were asked to support the organization by signing a petition. Some instructors had even informed their students the preceding day that class would be cancelled, some rescheduling classes for an off-campus location later in the day.

The University viewed the action as a form of a strike and the incident was reported to the Labor Relations Commission for further investigation. According to Massachusetts State Law, "no public employee or employee organization shall engage in a strike, and no public employee or employee organization shall induce, encourage or condone a any strike, work stoppage, slowdown or withholding of services by such public employees."

The instructors that called in sick were informed by Associate Provost Susan Pearson that if they did not make up work missed by the final day of the summer class period that they would not be paid for teaching classes and would not be rehired for the upcoming semester.

"I don't think that it is unreasonable for employers not to rehire someone who hasn't fulfilled their services," Pearson said to the Daily Hampshire Gazette in regards to the sick-out.

GEO maintains that some if not all of the employees had indeed been sick that day and that the University is being unfair to the instructors.

"The University is treating this as a strike, they have contacted the instructors and basically told them that they will never ever work for Continuing Education again. This is a blacklist," Mason said. "In some ways we are pleased that the University is rattled but we are doing anything that we can to defend these eight instructors."

The instructors that called in sick were eight of 66 teaching continuing education classes.

"For months, the University has been saying that we don't have the

Cevallos said. "The cancellation of this event was also a clear signal from our part to the residents that we were indeed very serious about what was happening there."

The problems in Butterfield became clear to the rest of the campus on April 27, when 20-year-old Thomas Degnan, a sophomore natural resources conservation major, fell 35 feet from the roof of Butterfield while attempting to retrieve the Jolly Roger skull-and-crossbones flag, which flew from the top of the dorm as a symbol of the building's defiance of the administration.

Degnan was on the critical list for four weeks at Baystate Medical Center and discharged to an undisclosed rehabilitation facility, according to hospital officials.

"It's a tragedy. I'm really concerned about Tom," Gilbert said. "Its an example of the kinds of tragedy that we can experience if we don't have safety protocols."

The vandalism was the final straw though, Gilbert says, although "the tragedy influenced our decision."

"Thomas Degnan was not part of the decision to disband Butterfield, but it was certainly crucial in bringing to the fore issues of safety in the building," Cevallos said.

On May 2, Orchard Hill/Central Area Director Diana Fordham sent a letter to Butterfield residents, informing them of the restrictions that would be placed on the spring Banquet. First, Fordham reviewed the reasons for the restrictions.

"Michael Gilbert was present on banquet night last semester and he witnessed many health and safety concerns as well as serious University policy violations," Fordham wrote. "These violations and concerns include the following: drinking from open containers of alcohol in the hallways, destruction of University property, slow response by students in exiting Butterfield during a fire alarm, broken beer bottles in the hallways and stairwells, and noise policy violations."

The banquet, with its heightened security, went on as planned with the restrictions on May 11.

However, Housing's tightening hold on Butterfield resulted, according to UMass officials, in 20,000 dollars worth of damage to the building.

"Instead of getting the message, a group of them engaged in clearly dangerous behavior, vandalism that went beyond anything we could tolerate on this campus," Cevallos said.

On the night of May 24, one or more vandals ransacked Butterfield, destroying plumbing fixtures, spray-painting walls, breaking windows and disarming and disabling fire and security devices. Replacement, according to Gilbert, of the damaged property would be $20,000, but would cost, with labor, closer to $30,000.

Gilbert saw this destruction as a direct result of the restrictions placed on the Banquet.

"Efforts by Residence Life staff to work cooperatively with members of the current community have not produced perceptible modification of... behavior," Gilbert wrote in the June 11 letter. These efforts "in fact resulted in acts of extreme vandalism to the building during the last week of spring semester."

"Tampering with life safety equipment, throwing cement blocks from room windows, setting a couch on fire behind the building, ripping toilet partitions from the walls, painting explicit graffiti on wall surfaces throughout the building and trashing the dining area with litter and broken bottles are some of the examples of this senseless and negative activity," Gilbert continued. "These are not simple pranks."

The incident is still under investigation.

"We have some leads," UMass police chief Jack Luippold said. "We're still hopeful we'll be able to identify the individual or individuals."

By Housing's estimation, there were some 70 students still in the building at the time of the incident; however, the UMPD were not contacted until the next morning by Residence Life staff. The UMPD has sent out letters to students who were in the building at the time, asking them for assistance. Luippold insists that somebody knows something.

"I find it hard to believe that the residents in the building were not aware," Luippold said.

"The rest of the residents, to my knowledge, have refused to help in our investigation," Cevallos said.

Butterfield residents were then removed and scattered across campus.

"Because of the behaviors displayed by some former Butterfield residents we will not place Butterfield residents together in any of the residence halls," Assistant Director of Housing David Vaillancourt wrote in another June 11 letter to students. "We will, however place existing roommate pairs together in a new assignment."

Gilbert's move has drawn criticism from student government leaders, who say that Gilbert has punished the entire building for the actions of a few who may not even be residents. (For more coverage of the SGA/Michael Gilbert conflict please see the story on page 1.)

Gilbert and Housing has also drawn fire from student leaders over the installation of a video surveillance camera on the southern side of the Van Meter cupola, which overlooks Butterfield's balconies and a portion of the Butterfield roof.

"There has been a history of students choosing to climb up on the roof, and on the balconies," Gilbert said. "It is connected and it is operable should we determine to turn it on."

The camera has not, to date, been turned on. The SGA is protesting the fact that student leaders were not consulted or informed of the decision until after it had been made. The decision, according to Gilbert, was made in mid-July, and that there was no opportunity to inform the SGA until their scheduled meeting last week.

"I mentioned it to them last week when we spoke," Gilbert said. "I didn't speak to them earlier because there was not a set date."

The SGA vehemently denies that this was the case.

"Michael has my phone number, he has [Student Trustee] Jon [Laubinger]'s phone number, and he has [Student Speaker] Aaron [Saunders]'s phone number, he has called us to schedule meetings in the past and to change meeting times. The lines of communication were clearly open, at least on our end," Sheehan asserted. "In fact, when the Butterfield situation first arose, Jon went to Michael's office personally to see to it that those lines were open."

The SGA claims that by not informing or consulting them before placing the camera, the administration violated the tenets of the Wellman Document. Wellman, a Trustee document, states that the SGA has "primary responsibility" over issues of student affairs, and needs to be consulted in matters pertaining to student affairs.

"Its my understanding before any of these actions were taken . . . there should have been prior consultations," Student Legal Services Director Charles DiMare, counsel for the SGA said. "The idea of completely abolishing a program without student governance consultation violates the Trustee policy."

President Sheehan says that Gilbert knew the consequences of circumventing Wellman in this and the camera issue.

"He [Laubinger] said to him [Gilbert] that whenever another situation comes to rise involving student issues in which the student voice needs to be heard, the SGA is to be informed of these situations which are specified in Wellman. That was in June. Michael said this would be

Last man standing: one returns to dorm

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

To say that Butterfield will be given a totally new face this year isn't entirely correct. While all former Residents have been asked to find new homes on campus or off, one Resident Assistant (RA), has been allowed to return to his former residence.

Troy LoRusso, a sophomore majoring in Plant and Soil Sciences, has been allowed to return to his former job as an RA in the building. The Butterfield community was disbanded after the building was extensively vandalized on the night of May 24. So, while all of LoRusso's former residents were forced to find other places to live, he remains, the last vestige of the former community. The students, who moved in three days ago, are mostly freshmen and all are new to the dorm.

According to Housing Director Mike Gilbert, all of Lorusso's co-workers moved on to different positions or graduated, and his immediate boss, Assistant Resident Director Jennifer Scumaci, asked to be moved to another housing area. Lorusso elected to stay. Gilbert saw no reason for him not to.

"[He was] in no way responsible for the damage to Butterfield," Gilbert said. "I have no reason to believe that the RAs participated in the vandalizing of that building, nor were they negligent in their oversight."

Dawn Thompson, the Assistant Director of Housing Services declined to elaborate on LaRusso's reinstatement, saying only that the personal was not held responsible for the vandalism.

Gilbert did concede that the Campus Police had not been contacted at any point during the final night of vandalism, a fact backed up by the University of Massachusetts Police Department. According to UMass Police Chief Jack Luippold, officers were contacted about the vandalism just after 4 am and did a walk through of the building. Noting extensive damage, another officer was sent to Butterfield at 7 am to file an official report. The investigation into the vandalism is ongoing, Luippold said, but attempts to learn of what happened on that final night in Butterfield have turned up very little.

Javier Cevallos, the Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs said that he didn't "think we considered any RAs responsible for anything. RAs were not being considered members of the Butterfield community."

LoRusso refused to comment for this story without checking with Residence Life. Scumaci, now an ARD in Coolidge Tower in Southwest, also refused comment. Jon Yaun, LoRusso's Resident Director, told the Collegian that he'd been told not to answer any questions.

A second Butterfield RA, Kara Turner, is also returning to the building, but she was in England at the time of last semester's vandalism.

done. However, when we met last week, he admitted to me that the camera was discussed among the administration since mid-July," Sheehan said. "For him to say that there was never a time to contact us, which he never did, is absolutely ridiculous and, frankly, untrue. There is a long time period between mid-July and mid-August. Never once did Michael even attempt to include students in the discussion, not once."

Vice Chancellor Cevallos explained that the camera is there for safety reasons.

"We had been thinking about cameras for sometime as the situation deteriorated. If somebody climbs that roof we will have it documented. One accident is one accident too many," Cevallos said.

Gilbert offered assurances that the students affected by the camera will be informed if it is turned on. He also states that the work on Butterfield will be completed in time for opening day, and the arrival of 48 Commonwealth College students and 58 Residential Academic Programs students.

Therese Pasquale, the Associate Director of RAP, explained how the building was reprogrammed.

"There was a meeting with Housing and Dean [of Students] Joanne Yanin, and Javier about what to do with the building. He [Cevallos] basically said that this is it, and for me and [Director of RAP] Joe Battista to come up with some plans for reprogramming," Pasquale said. "There were a few more meetings to go over our plans."

"After Housing made a decision, they approached us," Commonwealth College Interim Dean Linda Slakey said. Two ComCol learning communities, focusing on community service, will have part of the building. Some classes will also be held in the building.

RAP will have other parts of the building, and will also hold classes there. Butterfield's new residents moved in on September 2.

As to Butterfield's former residents, Gilbert explained, they weren't necessarily bad students, but something had to be done.

"The thing is, there are a lot of residents who were very good students and residents, and I acknowledge that. It's really unfortunate when they lose a privilege because of the behavior of other students," Gilbert said. "It's not an ideal decision, but it's the best one."

Gilbert's acknowledgement doesn't suit Sheehan.

"How can they justify not consulting us?" Sheehan asked. "Why did Housing let the situation get that bad?"

tion to ensure a safe environment for students to live in. This obligation does not give Housing Services and UMass administration the right to arbitrarily evict students from their home," the statement read. "Nothing, especially the actions of others, can justify punishing innocent students."

Director of Housing Services Michael Gilbert stood by his decision.

"If I can't remove all the students acting in bad ways, I can't guarantee the safety of the good students." Gilbert said. "That error is more serious than taking away these privileges. Protecting people is more important."

Student Trustee Jon Laubinger and President John Sheehan both expressed their frustrations on the issue, claiming that Gilbert had lied to them.

"Michael Gilbert has been very uncooperative in involving students in the decision processes of Housing Services under the Wellman Document."

Laubinger said. "I personally met with Michael Gilbert prior to the closing of Butterfield and he told me that he would be open to discuss the issue.

I later came to find out that they closed the building and he had failed to contact John [Sheehan] or myself. He clearly lied to us on this instance as well as when it came to consulting us on the camera that was placed on the Van Meter dormitory."

The Wellman document is a Trustee text, which states that the SGA has "primary responsibility" over issues of student affairs and needs to be consulted in matters pertaining to student affairs.

Sheehan further described the closing of Butterfield as "negligent" on behalf of UMass Housing Services and feels that the administration ignored the Wellman document. He furthered explained that not only was the SGA not made aware of the decisions, but students themselves.

"The closing of Butterfield is a cover-up for the years of negligence by housing, and as a result they lost control of the situation up there," Sheehan said. "I want to make it clearly apparent that housing dropped the ball here and no matter what side your on, the fact remains that they messed up and tossed students from their home without even consulting the SGA."

Gilbert responded to Laubinger and Sheehan's allegations by explaining that he had preferred not to comment on the situation to the press.

"I'd prefer dealing with them in person and not having an argument with them through the press. There always welcome at my office, but I'm not interested in having a debate with them in the newspapers over this," Gilbert said.

Other members of the SGA also expressed concerns over the lack of student involvement in the decision to close Butterfield. Speaker of the Senate Aaron Saunders explained that he felt the decision was appalling and that housing did not make the effort they should have.

Saunders commented on the lack of preventive and disciplinary measures from the Resident Assistants [RAs] as well as the Resident Director [RD] of Butterfield when dangerous situations arose within the building.

"Residence Life has not taken any responsibility for this and I wonder where the RAs and the RD were when things got out of hand," Saunders said. "These are the people that they pay to be there in charge of the building and the situations that may arise, yet they are still living there."

Sheehan and Laubinger further stressed that aside from the SGA's lack of involvement, it was the lack of student awareness on the issue that is the real problem.

"When I sit in a meeting with an administrator they're not talking to just me, there talking twenty thousand undergraduates," Sheehan said. "It's not even about the SGA, but the fact that it's our primary responsibility to keep students informed on issues around campus, and what does it say for us when we can't do that. In the end it's the students that suffer."

Back to school:
From the editors

Well that was fast, wasn't it?

For those of you new here at the University of Massachusetts, and those of you back for return engagements, you'll find that the coming weeks and months will rush by much like this summer has, as Amherst wakes up and quickly gets down to business.

What happens around this town and, more specifically, this campus, is very much our business at the Collegian. As a daily newspaper we do our best, while working around classes and other activities, to report on the subjects that concern this campus, the town and surrounding communities.

One complaint that never fails to filter down to the Campus Center basement, however, is that the pages of the Collegian are not diverse enough, that they insufficiently represent the study body here at UMass. Frankly, we couldn't agree more. This is a student paper, the student paper here at the University, and each year it is plagued by a problem that remains stubborn and consistent: not enough students work here, whatever the individual reasoning behind that may be. We hear complaints that something was missed, reported inadequately, spelled incorrectly and, in general, done poorly. In nearly every case, however, the dialogue ceases and nobody offers a hand.

This is our call to you.

If you're a journalism student, get yourself down here. Now. Don't wait until the spring of your senior year when a professor requires a published piece from you. You can gain invaluable practical experience here that most classes never approach. You'll need to make decisions. Ask smart questions. In short, you'll start taking steps that will lead to becoming a better journalist and writer. That is, if you stick with it.

We need you to. Not only those journalism students, for which participation with this paper, in theory, should be a given. All of you. Those of you sitting in English, Anthropology, Communications or even Physics classes are equally able and welcome to pitch in and help this paper fully realize what it could very easily be.

Working for the Collegian doesn't tie you down to exclusively writing, either. There are always photographs waiting to be taken, ads begging to be sold and computers itching to be toyed with by the talented hands of a graphics-savvy individual. Suggest story ideas, write letters or submit columns.

The truth is, we can't make this paper bigger, better or more diverse without you. That "we" includes ALL of you – each and every person that sees something they don't like and decides to do something about it. Every step helps the paper to grow, and only then will it come to more fully and accurately depict those who pick it up each and every day.

On to a better road

ROB SCHULTZE

It's the end of July and I'm in a cheap Best Western hotel outside of San Francisco. To be more precise, I'm soaking in the bathtub of said hotel room rubbing Mr. Bubble onto the back of the hot naked woman in there with me.

"God damn," I think to myself. "I didn't see this coming a week ago."

And I really hadn't.

This wasn't a one-night stand or just some random California hook-up. The beautiful woman was my girlfriend of many, many months, the only reason a New England hick like myself would ever venture out to a far coast that seemed, from a safe distance, so strange and weird. Although a UMass student, she's from that far-away place ("I wish they all could be California girls" indeed) and my entire summer revolved around this vacation to visit her.

I missed her terribly while she was there and I was in Amherst. I counted the days until my plane flew.

It was to my utter, utter surprise that when I landed things were different. She was distant from me, our conversations were awkward, and when we touched the fire that had been there wasn't even a spark. A day into the visit, with a horrible sense of foreboding, I pulled her down on a couch next to me and asked her what was wrong. Her eyes began to tear up.

What was wrong was basically this: She'd been exploring the option of not returning to UMass for the second semester of this year, but rather transferring to a UCal, which would put us on opposite coasts. Long-distance relationships like that simply don't work. She didn't know how to tell me.

She further explained, near tears the entire time, that it wasn't until she had returned home for the summer that she realized how much UMass had failed to fulfill her. In California she felt independent, able to attend to all her dreams and aspirations, better able to determine what the hell she wanted to do with her life. She still loves me, she insisted, but there was definitely a strong chance that it would all be over by the end of the year.

She looked me directly in the eyes for the first time in the entire conversation and waited.

I forget what exactly I said in that moment of shock, although my best guess would be something utterly inadequate.

This discussion (in mutated forms, following many conversions and tangents, always emotional, sometimes painful, sometimes not, and often with tears on both sides that could never be easily explained) would continue for the next several days. We both struggled to work through our demons and our emotions and at the end came to discover that it didn't change a god damned thing.

Why, you ask? Why did the placing of what basically amounted to a timer on our relationship which could go off at any time (a month, a year, two years, who knows) not alter the facts?

For one thing, she made it very plain right from the get-go that she still wanted to be with me. The whole game was in my hands. It was still remarkably complicated for me until I finally saw straight and realized that I was a total moron. At that point everything got absurdly simple.

Let me explain.

Unlike some of you, I come from an unbroken, loving home where my parents have always been married to each other and rarely fight, and then usually only about my father mowing the lawn versus watching the Sox game. Also, very much like the majority of you, I have my eyes fixed squarely on the future – my life after college, where I'll be, what I'll be doing, if I'll be able to feed myself and not have to move back into my parents' house (which, loving and whole as it may be, would be a fate worse than death.)

What this means is that I have great faith in the power of relationships to be stable, loving, positive and permanent. I never get involved in what I think would be a short-term relationship – I'm in it for the long haul. It also means that that has tended to be the only kind of relationship I ever wanted.

I don't mean to be all psychoanalytic or anything here, but I think it's fairly apparent that I've always basically used my dad's life as a blueprint for my own – UMass, marriage, job, kids, life. That's the pattern which has always been buried in my subconscious, which I've always seen myself following. I'd get out, settle down, and that would be that.

These events shook that up. She and I were by no means doomed, but we also had a real chance of becoming a long-distance friendship rather than an intense relationship. According to the Schulze blueprint I should break this off and once again start looking for something more stable. If a relationship couldn't be permanent like that of my parents, who began dating in middle school, and had a real chance of not someday leading to a suburban family life after college, than it shouldn't be in the plan. It was clear-cut.

I didn't want to, though. There was no single part of me screaming to leave her behind. Let me make one thing quite clear: she's the most amazing person I've ever met, AND she has a great ass. We're in love, and it's really that simple, which is what made this so complicated. There was no compromise solution. Something had to give: my path or my woman.

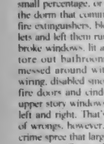
Needless to say, she won. And I'll never be able to thank her enough.

She finally made me look, really look at what I'd decided my life would be. Frankly, it isn't all that appetizing. Hell, my dad would be the first to tell you that he isn't all the crazy about his life himself, especially when he's got a couple of Schulzeweisers in him.

Maybe I won't ever get married. Maybe I'll decide to travel cross-country and write a book about it after I graduate. I've always had this vague fantasy about living in Canada – maybe I'll get a job for a paper in Toronto (the best city ever) and live the American expatriate lifestyle in the Great White North. Maybe I'll say f.ck it and join the Peace Corps. Maybe I'll be the vocalist for a crappy metal band and wonder why we never get signed, never aware of the fact that I can't sing to save my life. Maybe I just won't date for a while and concentrate on sit-ups and memorizing the lyrics to every Springsteen song, including the B-sides. Who knows? Maybe I will get married and go to work right out of school.

It doesn't matter. What matters is that I do what she's taught me: follow what makes me happy and let the future take care of itself. If she needs to go to California than she should. I wish her the best of luck and I know that we'll always have each other in some capacity. She should follow her dreams, just as I should follow mine, but that doesn't mean that right now has to be ruined.

As long as I don't do anything to totally screw me up, whatever comes next will take care of itself, and I bet that if I follow my gut and don't worry about what people think that it'll be damned good. And what makes me happy now and what my gut tells me is that she and I have something too special to let go.



Who knows what will come tomorrow? Maybe she won't leave at all. Maybe I'll get an Itch and move out there. Maybe we'll be best friends until the day we die, me a bachelor and her happily married to a guy I can't stand. Maybe we'll meet again ten years from now and nothing will have changed. Maybe I'll get hit by a bus tomorrow – I would not want my last thought to be "You stupid goddamned pasty bald son of a bitch, I cannot believe you let her get away because you were afraid to live now and be happy." It's a lot of maybes, but what else is there when you're our age? Sometimes I forget just how young we all really are. Life just got started, man, and that's fairly damned cool.

So what's the point? You can't let the future ruin what you have now, and you can't set your limits just when you're starting to realize your potential. Deciding what your life is before it has actually happened can only stunt it forever. After all, if I had broken it off when my father would have, I'd never have wound up naked in a sleazy California hotel bathtub with the woman I love, and that would have been a shame. Mr. Bubble would never have forgiven me.

The two faces of Butterfield

A new Butterfield? Yes!

DAN LAMOTHE

An entire building laying in ruin. Tens of thousands of dollars in damage. All that I've heard since the administration decided to start Truth Scratch with a "new" Butterfield this year is how unfair it is to last year's residents to kick them out of their dorm.

Hello? Didn't ya'll wreck the place, guys?

I understand that not all of the residents are responsible for the small fortune in damages that occurred there. I understand that it was in fact probably a small percentage, or at least less than half of the residents in the dorm that committed the vandalism: stole/discharged the fire extinguishers, blocked up the toilets and left them running over night, lit a couch on fire, tore out bathroom stall dividers, messed around with the electrical wiring, disabled smoke alarms, threw fire doors and cinder blocks out of upper story windows and broke glass left and right. That's a damn big list of wrongs, however, and when a body of students goes on a crime spree that large for fun and giggles, there has to be consequences. Thomas Degnan halling from the tool last year is a separate and sad incident – it has nothing to do with the fate of Butterfield's residents this year. The mayhem is its own story.

> "UMass housing deserves the right to protect themselves and the rest of us against Butterfield being destroyed again."

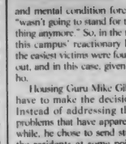
UMass housing deserves the right to protect themselves and the rest of us against Butterfield being destroyed again. Why should we care? Because regardless of whether or not the average UMass student lives in or knows anyone that lived in Butterfield last year, we are all paying for this in some way. Perhaps we're not writing the checks or hammering the nails, but repairing the mayhem that occurred at Butterfield is going to cost each and every one of us out of our own pockets. That dribbly showerhead, that leaky window and that terrible odor coming from down the hall out of the heater? Thank Butterfield 2001 for that, because that is probably the reason that you're stuck with them this year.

UMass isn't footing the bill for this one alone. Where did the university get a fair share of the money that they will be shelling out in the supplies, wages and building materials that will be necessary to rebuild Butterfield? Our pockets. Both as Massachusetts residents (many of us) and as students (all of us), our money goes into the UMass budget, and from there it is used as the administration sees fit. Nearly every cent that is spent to repair Butterfield is money that UMass could have spent elsewhere, on things like repairs and upgrades in housing that we as residents will not enjoy this year because of the time, money and energy needed to make Butterfield habitable again.

I compare this to the high school basketball practices I used to participate in, or to recess when it was raining and I was in the first grade. If our team did not give a good effort, sure enough we'd be running sprints before practice was over.



Likewise, if someone would not share a toy at recess, the toy would inevitably be taken away from everyone in general for the day. A dorm building should be no different. Since there would have been no conclusive way to determine that all of the residents responsible for last spring's mayhem have been removed, all of the residents need to be removed. Sometimes people that have not done anything wrong get punished for the general good of everyone involved. Such is life. When drivers fly through a residential neighborhood on a regular basis, complaints are made and speed traps are set up. When workers in a company arrive dressed sloppily, management cracks down on the dress code for all workers, not just the ones arriving in grass-stained cut-off jeans. Sometimes to fix a problem, one has to hit a spider with a sledgehammer to kill it.

Of all the people on campus with housing problems this fall, last year's Butterfield residents should be the last to complain. It's not as if they've been evicted from the building and left with no place to go. UMass housing has simply stated that they are going to have to live somewhere else on campus this year, paying the same amount of money as before in a different building. Considering the way that many colleges bill students when property is damaged, Butterfield's residents should consider themselves damn lucky and take the lesson for what it was worth.

While Butterfield 2001 residents have been promised a room, regardless of what they may have done last year, we've got students living in Amherst center, in the UMass hotel, and in lounges campus-wide because administration geniuses have once again enrolled too many students. This is not to say that the Butterfield residents should have all been thrown off campus for good. I do think, however, that they should be a little slower to complain, considering all that happened – UMass is short on housing and they could have easily stuck it to the whole of last year's Butterfield. There are going to be many, many students left searching for housing this year -and it easily could have been Butterfield's residents. UMass owes them nothing more. If you lived in Butterfield last year, be thankful for the room you've got this year – because unlike so many others, it's better than no room at all.

This is progress?

SAM WILKINSON

Let's not split hairs here.

Butterfield residents got removed their former residence not because of a final decadent night of vandalism last semester, but rather because, four weeks earlier, a student fell off of that building's roof. He now lies placidly still, in a coma. Water fountains may have been torn from the walls and fire extinguishers improperly discharged last Spring, but it was Thomas Degnan's fall that forced the administration's hand.

His fall and subsequent physical and mental condition forced UMass to communicate that it "wasn't going to stand for this kind of thing anymore." So, in the tradition of this campus' reactionary leadership, the easiest victims were found, singled out, and in this case, given the heave-ho.

Housing Guru Mike Gilbert didn't have to make the decision he did. Instead of addressing the serious problems that have apparently plagued Butterfield for quite a while, he chose to send strongly worded letters of caution to the residents at some point last academic year. Instead of cracking down on the dorm with a zero-tolerance policy for misbehavior or pleading for more security (accepting the current practice that the weakest members of student security are usually placed in the supposedly most placid places), Gilbert chose to wait idly by. All of those insteads eventually led to irresponsible and uncontrolled student behavior that led a resident to climb onto Butterfield's roof and subsequently fall off, virtually ending his life.

> "While UMass has shown that, yes, it can respond quite cruelly in the face of a serious disaster, it hasn't taken steps to prevent or intercept misbehavior."

Don't get me wrong. Gilbert isn't any more responsible for Degnan's condition than anybody else. But the point is that a situation that most would seem to describe as being out of hand wasn't handled. It was allowed to worsen until a final, horrific act put UMass in its usual position: on its heels, scrambling for footing that wasn't available.

"What did you do to prevent this," asks the public?

And UMass has no response, because nothing was done, despite knowledge on all sides that there were definite problems. It's like UMass thought the rattle in the car engine would go away if the stereo was loud enough. That's typical for the response around here. There are no problems until they've gotten so out of control that they can't be reversed. And if they can't be reversed, they can only be suddenly, and fiercely, responded to.

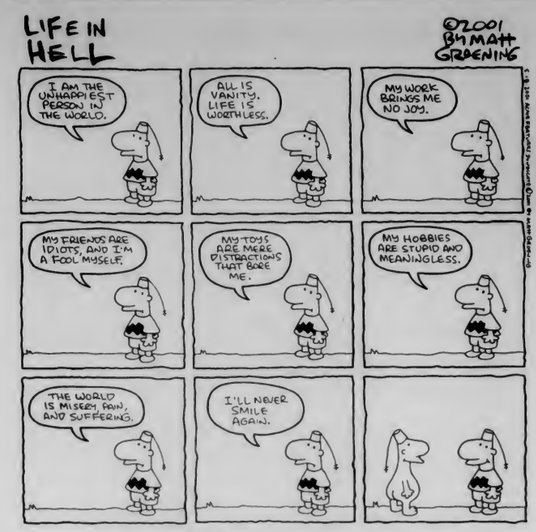
Hence, Butterfield residents got the boot. Mike Gilbert absolutely had to look like he was cracking down on students that were totally out of control. For the casual observer, it didn't matter that Degnan wasn't a Butterfield resident; it was where he fell.

Re-enter the public: "If nothing was done, something must happen."

And now, UMass can say "Something did."

Of course, Butterfield residents didn't exactly go out of their way to avoid some sort of recourse. Instead of taking even the slightest amount of responsibility for the injury, the residents, in their hazy way, pointed at Degnan and said he was solely at fault. It wasn't the feud, nor was it the haughty attitude that made people want to belong in Butterfield. It was just one student (who didn't even live there!) being stupid.

Apparently, to bolster the argument, the residents also helpfully noted in conversation and in letters that nobody should make the playoffs (come on Nomah!) or, if not then, this fall's Midnight Madness. The whole of Southwest surely won't be booted out on its collective butt if there is serious vandalism there, even though there always, always, always is. UMass can't possibly intend to remove entire dormitories any time there is vandalism the likes of which were seen in Butterfield. For everyone involved, that would be a nightmare.



Second, students with plenty of reasons to lack faith in our institution have just been given more reasons. A large block of Butterfield was punished without explanation, trial, or any sort of recourse. There is no appeal process for those shown the door, nor was there any process at all. Gilbert seemingly woke up with an idea about not letting the door hit the students' ass on their way out and then he acted on it. What little that the SGA tried to do was simply too late. Students at home for the summer could do little more than look forward to an exciting year in Sylvan.

Third, and perhaps most insidious and yet typical of our school, no steps have been taken to prevent this in the future. None. While UMass has shown that, yes, it can respond quite cruelly in the face of a serious disaster, it hasn't taken steps to prevent or intercept misbehavior, or to diagnose problems before they happen. Instead, it has set itself up only to respond to serious incidents like Degnan with equally drastic measures. Where does this decision leave everyone? Right where they were, with the exception of the former residents, who are now scattered throughout the local area. UMass still lacks steady footing but it has slightly less egg on its face, which is apparently acceptable. Students have seen the mighty power of the UMass administration, but given no reason to believe that "it could happen to them" as the saying goes, without any sort of stated future policy. Thomas Degnan, meanwhile, doesn't even know what Butterfield is anymore.

One would hope that, to avoid such an incident, UMass would put more thought into their decisions. Instead of splitting hairs by claiming that vandalism forced former residents out, why not be honest and admit it was the practical death of a student engaged in behavior that could have been, at the very least, watched for and likely prevented? UMass has tried to shake the public's anger with a decisive, revenge oriented decision. Instead, why not try to avoid accidents like Degnan, thus depriving the public of reasons to be angry?

It all begins here

"Hello everybody and welcome to UMass! My name is Matt and I'll be your tour guide today." The charismatic student standing before us smiled broadly, accentuating his warm demeanor.

"I'm a senior theater major here, and this world," he paused for effect, gesturing in an exaggerated manner to the Campus Center behind him, as if to emphasize the scope of the university, "is my stage. "And," he added, "It gets quite windy here, so gentlemen, please hold on to your toupees."

What followed Matt's comedic introduction was the requisite, albeit overly dramatic tour, of the campus I have since grown to call home. It was my first and lasting impression of UMass in the summer of 1996, before my junior year of high school. I had just begun my college search and my quest for higher education had led me from the suburbs of New Jersey to New England and the vast Pioneer Valley.

Choosing a school was a no-brainer for me. My high school was tiny – I graduated in a class of about 127 students – and I was determined that college would not be an extension of high school. So while most of my friends were applying to small, private schools in upstate New York, Connecticut and Pennsylvania I sought out the bigger, out-of-state schools. Size and location were the two most important factors. Eventually I narrowed it down to several big universities: UMass, Maryland, UVA, NYU and BU, with UMass as my top choice. I ruled out NYU and BU in the end because of the direct urban setting (and NYU would have meant commuting from home) and Maryland and UVA were much further from home.

It made sense to pick UMass, because I have relatives in northern Mass and my sister was attending Brown in Providence at the time. In addition, Amherst was only a few hours driving distance from my hometown. And it was the most appealing of all the college towns I had visited. So the location of UMass and the suburban/rural environment it offered seemed perfect to me.

Five years later, my opinion of this school and of Amherst has changed. Yet it has changed in the way things tend to once we become familiar with them. I know this campus like the back of my hand now and this place provides all the comforts of home. So much so, that this past summer I stayed in Amherst and worked for Admissions as a student representative and tour guide.

During my tours, I recalled my initial intimidation of this campus when I arrived in the fall of 1998. I remember how overwhelming it was at first – the fact that I was living in a dorm where more people resided than the entire population of my high school and a residential area that was more populated than my hometown. I spoke of the advice I was given, such as when I was lost, to consult my trusty campus map tailor-made for freshmen, and to always look out for the campus jewel, the mother of all libraries. Somehow, though, those helpful students I encountered on campus neglected to mention that I would also need a compass. I still got lost anyway, at first. I told prospective students that RAP was a godsend my freshman year when I chose a dorm randomly at orientation and Coolidge 21 ended up becoming my surrogate family. And above all, I told everyone how much I'll miss this place when my four years here are up. Time truly does fly.

For this year, my senior year, I presently have four goals. One, I will write consistently for this paper (having already promised my good friend Melody Zagami that I'd lend my pearls of wisdom to Ed/Op.). Two, I am FINALLY going to take that yoga class that has eluded me since freshman year. Every year, it has been oversubscribed, and this year I am determined to get in. Three, I will make the most of senior year and continue the bar-hopping that began near the end of last year when I officially became legal. And finally, I will find a job before graduation, a next-to-impossible feat considering I am a journalism major. I think it's safe to say that last goal will be the most difficult to reach.

To all you freshmen, I offer a few sound words of advice: One, no matter how adventurous you are, never sample dishes at the DC with names like Korean Barbecued Tofu. Also, steer clear of the deadly Steak and Cheese sub, which tastes and looks like burnt rubber with a Cheez-Whiz glue. It makes you wonder what firestone did with all those confiscated tires. In fact, to be safe, avoid all sorry excuses for meat (and anything unfit for human consumption, so…basically everything) the DC attempts to serve. Two, if you live in Southwest, buy stock in earplugs and sedatives, which will come in mighty handy when the Power and Class of New England marches through on Saturday mornings before football games. Nothing aggravates an impending hangover like the insistent resounding of fifty trumpets and tubas penetrating your eardrums and waking you from a peaceful cocoon of sleep at the crack of dawn. For the love of God and everything holy, the marching band should be stopped. Three, beware the repercussions of the frat scene, a freshman rite-of-passage. Two words: beer goggles. Four, for most of you, this year will be a breeze. Bask in it while it lasts. For those of you in RAP, you'll look back in longing at the days when you complained about going to class, and that class was 9:30 a.m. college writing in your own dorm.

Finally, to quote a wise man I once met, "this world of UMass is your stage." The next four years of your life will be played out on this stage. How you choose to write your script is up to you. Your adventure is just about to begin. Good luck, find the roles you were meant to play, and have the time of your lives. Oh, and metaphorically speaking, watch out for the wind and hold on to your toupees.

Café Espirit: A city is just a city

SHARON STAMPLEY

I have just pulled one of the most juvenile stunts in the state of New York. I've stolen a light green iridescent pen the shape of a soppy spaghetti strand from the information clerk at Barnes & Nobles. Why, you may ask? For the sole purpose of retreating to my window view of 66th and Columbus and over my Café Mocha brew and cinnamon scone digest the sights and sounds of the last three hours, pre-lunch if you will. You see, I'm not here every day. Though I am only a half an hour drive from the 'city that never sleeps,' it is during the other five days of the week when you can find me hibernating in a great suburbia called New Jersey (you, unfortunately, may make reference to it as the 'smelly state', a slang all too familiar with the foul odors that circulate the Jersey Turnpike). It is only upon the duties of an intern that one (if given the impulse) could trace my steps, every Thursday and Friday, from the Hoboken Path train to the 1 & 9. Never mind the minor details. Which details would those be? Oh, that many of those steps would prove interrupted on the occasion of a snapped heel strap or run-of-the-mill surrender to the governing summer sun (a.k.a. faint). It's not easy commuting to the city twice a week, nevertheless in the knee buckling, hair sodden heat.

New York City is a funny place. I don't think many would refer to it this way. I would think they would be more inclined to tag it as a refuge for dreamers, a center stage for drama, maybe even a great banquet hall for the 'feast of culture.' Of course it can be described in all of these ways. Yet, I prefer to call it a funny place. When I write 'funny' I mean 'strange', not the 'funny' that could only describe the scene of the information clerk shouting up to me for his fettuccini-style pen from the escalator. I suppose they've run out of penne regatta. I watch the business suit next to me hastily brush away the whipped cream mustache that, courteous to his Godiva Cocoa, finds a place in the creases of his upper lip. No doubt an upper lip all too familiar with the scowled expression. Why do I assume this? Wait. Let's get back to the bigger picture. Why do I insist on branding New York City as a funny place? I thought you would never ask…

I sit in this Barnes & Nobles Café and I wonder. I wonder if this great city would stand as proud if it were stripped of its recklessness and cold, impersonal stares. After all, it is this city etiquette that separates a New York City crowd from most others. It is we who line the subway tracks (briefcases in hand, watches in check), it is we who tear into traffic with dogmatic ease (heels clicking through a sea of taxi cabs), and it is we who finally, if we're lucky to have made it this far, make our way up to the fourth floor Barnes & Nobles Café (paper under arm, wallets on guard). I can include myself in this grouping only now as I note the crowd around me becoming a bit more relaxed settled in their mahogany chairs with their midday delights. A bit more.. REAL. Yes, a perfect fit. Real is the word I've been searching for.

I spot the man who was outside minutes ago scouring his pack of Parliament 100s for a cigarette. As I recall, he was cursing, quite obscenely at that, that his luck would have him wait this long for a drag. What is he doing now? Well, at this very moment he is drowning in the pages of Maxim magazine, each turned corner pulling him further in. And, may I add, with an intensity far greater than the nicotine in his jacket pocket. The silhouette of a middle-aged woman clad in a black baby-doll dress becomes familiar to me. She stands behind the rims of the white marble counter deliciously detailing an order of Café Au Lait and a chocolate biscotti to the cashier. For hadn't she, not too long ago, responded to a tourist's request for directions in the most monotone of replies? Yes, she's the one.

So then, let's stop observing for a moment to ask ourselves what is going on here, shall we? Throw some café stools and a few magazines together and the rude, vindictive nature of this city just…poof…into thin air. Like the strings of a puppet this city has the power to pull almost anybody along to the part of 'city-slicker.' Even me, I'm afraid. For at about 7:15 this morning any surrounding witness could vouch that these angel eyes turned a dark, abandoned black in the face of the mindless adolescent who brushed against my shoulders all too unfavorably. Though here I am – alas, setting free my morning thoughts to the perimeters of this CVS receipt (don't you just hate how you are never prepared when you hear the lightest knock of inspiration at your door) – finding comfort in this small café too.

The lesson is obvious. Or is it? Strip New York City of its image and it's just a city. But Mr. – Mr., I want to turn around and say…(For how could I have forgotten the presence of our Mr. Geppetto (see Pinocchio) so soon?)

Who are you without your cocoa mustache?

Exactly. Just a suit.

In our defense:
A look at the U.S. missile policy

Missile defense is a murky, complicated issue if you listen to what you hear on most any network news broadcast. Fundamentally, the critics are right. The current plan for a missile defense system, be it national or theater, does violate the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972.

The Treaty, between the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States, has been described by some pundits as the one thing ensuring world peace for nearly thirty years now. In a way, the pundits are right. But it's the way they reached this conclusion that is never mentioned.

The reason nobody fired a missile during the Cold War was because every missile in the northern hemisphere would then be raining down on our pretty little heads. Uranium snowflakes would shower both Americans and Russians alike. Yes, snowflakes…of Death! This, ladies and gentlemen, is called deterrence, and it did indeed ensure world peace. If anybody so much as sneezed in an intercontinental ballistic way, everybody dies.

In the late sixties and early seventies, it was realized that it was possible, in theory, to shoot down an intercontinental ballistic missile mid-flight, possibly with satellite based nuclear weapons (although this particular wrinkle was developed in the eighties). This raised some definite concerns on both sides. If the Reds could shoot down our attack, we'd be vulnerable, and that's something that simply couldn't happen. Turning that around yields the same result: a significant shift in the balance of power.

> "By saying our defense system will work anywhere and at anytime, we have violated the letter of the law, such as it is, in the ABM treaty."

Hence the ABM treaty. The treaty essentially says that it's okay for both the USSR and the USA to develop "missile shields" if they are not developed with the intent of preventing the other side from launching a successful nuclear strike. Simply put, it's like having a seat belt but not being able to use it in the event of a crash. Not very useful at all. Limited missile defense was allowed, meaning that ABM batteries were erected around Moscow, but nothing serious. The ABM treaty simply ensured that deterrence would be a viable peacekeeping measure in our white knuckle Cold War with the Commies. Ah, the memories.

It was a simpler time then, when men were men, women were women, and Scarecrow and Mrs. King ruled the airwaves. Russia was Cobra to our G.I. Joe, Boris and Natasha to our Moose and Squirrel, and evil communist realm to our glorious shining example of democracy. And really, there weren't too many countries with The Bomb. And then one Christmas morning, Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev decided that the whole Lenin thing wasn't really working out the way they thought it would, and gave up.

This was good and bad news. We won, but now had to deal with all sorts of people getting their hands on cheap weapons grade plutonium. These are collectively called the rogue states, including North Korea, Iraq, Libya and Idaho.

KEN CAMPBELL

Enough of this history lesson, though. As things stand right now, it is possible for the United States to destroy an incoming ballistic missile safely in flight. And since the proposed system would protect against any launch, it includes Russia.

Which is where the rub is. By saying our defense system will work anywhere and at anytime, we have violated the letter of the law, such as it is, in the ABM treaty.

Contrary to what you hear on the news, or are told by people who should know better, the entire world does not hate us. In fact, Italy and Taiwan have both encouraged and supported Mr. Bush's administration for pushing the plan.

However, we have not violated the spirit of the law. While we may not exactly trust Russia implicitly (there is always the threat of Ivan waking up on the wrong side of the vodka bottle) the system is not just to stave off our reoccurring nightmares of communist resurgence. I don't trust Putin, and I don't trust China. The ties between Russia and current communist countries worry me, especially since Russian communists are trying to seize power again. These developments, and the current level of violence in the world makes me think that we need some kind of strengthening in our defense, and if missile defense will work, then let's do it.

The system defends against any launch, accidental or deliberate, directed at our allies or us. And besides that nice cushy feeling of security, there's also the hefty price tag of 160 gazillion dollars.

I'm insinuating that the bill is a good thing. Its not as if the system works by throwing money at the missiles; it works because there are missiles to shoot, radars to track and satellites to confirm. And who builds those? People. Americans. That money goes to put food on people's table and clothes on people's backs. I'd rather my tax dollars, meager as they are, going out to help feed some family.

Besides, explosions are cool.

United States in need of a moral cleansing

Well, here we are, back for another year of learning. And not a moment too soon. The usual disdain for returning to school after a lively summer vacation didn't manifest itself this year. Actually, I have been longing to return for the past few months. This summer made me long for my hated exams and wish for the hours of boring classes.

Don't get me wrong. I love my parents. It's amazing that they put up with me for yet another summer. It's just that, this summer was the first in which I vaguely tasted, like thick phlegm, what my life would be like after college, and all summer I just wanted to spit it out with a loud "ptooie!"

Life moves too fast when you commute for three hours and work for eight, every day. The only thing I ever looked forward to was the weekend, which came and went far too quickly. Until now, I had never understood what people meant when they said life was passing them by.

And yet the summer lameness wasn't simply confined to my job, but seemed to manifest itself in all things—the media, movies, music, politics—especially politics. It seemed as if a dark cloud of mediocrity had descended upon the land of the free. Perhaps it has always been here.

The summer verdict is that the United States has become culturally sterile, incapable of producing anything of value. The media's adoption of Hollywood's formula for entertainment that passes as news has apparently succeeded, with more and more viewers turning off their brains every evening than ever before (on average, Americans watch between three and four hours of television a day). For people who watch regularly for fifty years of their life, that's more than six years down the proverbial tube.

And who better to mislead a nation of drooling CNN worshippers than he who, more than any other, has benefited from the "soft bigotry of low expectations"– George W. Bush himself. Perhaps it's better that the election was stolen for him. In fact, we should all thank the Supreme Court cronies for saving us from Al Gore, who doesn't look nearly as good on the nightly news. At least we have someone pretty to look at.

Despite the wonders that Bush's spinmeisters have done for his image, I don't see how anyone can buy his compassionate Conservatism. One wonders what is going through his mind as he works with Habitat for Humanity in Texas: "For God's sake, if only the Liberal soccer moms would all just tune in at the same time, I could quit this worthless, bleeding heart #@*&." Would a compassionate person find humor in an execution? In an interview with a reporter, Bush recounted the plea to him by Karla Fay Tucker, curling his lip and mockingly whimpering, "please don't kill me."

Her crime notwithstanding, it was the remark of someone who enjoys putting people to death.

This is the man we're all following as he takes us down a path toward unilateral actions that have no greater good in mind. In fact, our actions—a word that implies progress—are not actions at all, but reactions. And the US has taken on the appearance of Huntington's "lonely superpower," looking more like a cornered, dying animal lashing out in fear and desperation.

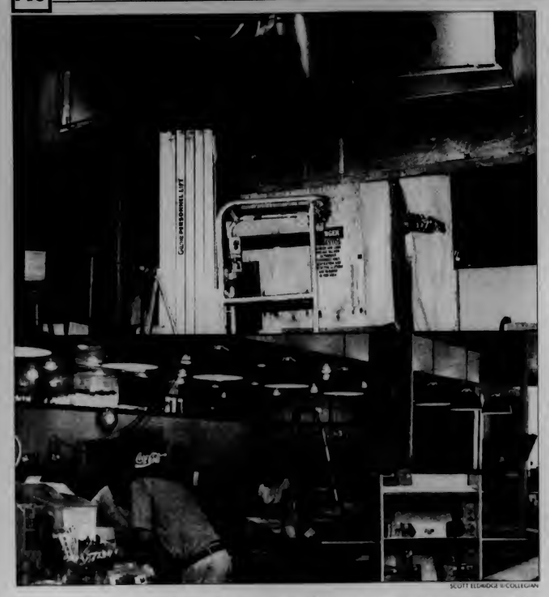
All over the world people are coming together, their only common bond being the hatred of an American-dominated world and the movements, like globalization, that America utilizes to take us there. We tout empty rhetoric about free elections and good government, while our own…well, we all know what happened.

Americans are the new Nazis. We are all responsible for the every day suffering that results from our irresponsible consumption of the world's resources. Our consumer God's unquenchable thirst for sacrifice is what leads to American weapons of war being used, either directly or indirectly, to continually pound helpless peoples into prostration at our feet. But we will drown in their blood. As Paul Bowles wrote, "There will come a day of reckoning…All this pleasure will have to be paid for, and it will be terrible."

The ascension of Bush to the other end of the television camera has greatly accelerated the process. Since then, we have been kicked off two United Nations committees, stood nearly alone in our rejection of the Kyoto Protocol (which 180 other countries accepted), and rejected two treaties: one banning the use of biological weapons, the other the use of landmines. We may not attend the world conference on racism.

SIMON PONGRATZ

Now, I'm not defending these efforts, as many were flawed (especially the Kyoto Protocol). It's the manner in which they were rejected, and the fact that no alternatives were offered, that are disturbing. But I must add that that the rejection of the ABM treaty with the old Soviet Union is warranted, and an effective missile defense is totally necessary. Unfortunately, this system, if ever completed, will only make us more brazen in our disrespect for the rule of law.



In a discussion with a friend about his recent trip to Greece, he mused that Americans seem to be hated everywhere. His advice for Americans travelling abroad: wear a Canadian flag on your backpack. He had seen the letters "USA" spray painted upon a wall, but in the place of the "S" was a swastika. Not surprising, especially given our brutal display of force in Kosovo, which stunned everyone. But during that talk, we came to a realization: we Americans are, in general, ignorant, rich, happy-go-lucky, opportunistic, selfish, socially irresponsible hedonists. In essence, we are all George W. Bush. The only difference is, we don't get to spend two months out of eight on vacation. And while Nero fiddles, the Middle East burns.

The caveat about representative government (or the illusion of one) is that, instead of one person or a group of people being responsible for its actions, we all are, the whole ignorant mass of us. Government decisions reflect upon us all, because they are responsible to us. Never mind that good representative government requires something America sorely lacks: an educated population that is active and informed. We have fulfilled Plato's prophecy, "The penalty good men pay for indifference to public affairs is to be ruled by evil men."

It would be nice to actually believe that our country is just, moral and upright. Unfortunately, the opposite is true – our actions around the world every day are deplorable. I suggest we do something about it, and soon, because the longer we wait, the more terrible it will be. So the next time you fill your tank with gasoline, breathe deeply and reflect on the fact that bombs are dropping and people are dying, to bring it to you.

Asbestos scatters UStore

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

The University Store has a new temporary location; actually, it has three. Originally located on the Campus Center Concourse, the UStore moved its contents in mid-June and will remain spread across the campus center until construction is completed at the beginning of December 2001.

The UStore was last renovated in 1983, and when construction began in mid-June asbestos was found that was supposedly removed during the last renovation of the UStore.

"Asbestos is a material that was used for insulation that is fire proof and in the last 15-20 years has been found to cause cancer. Handlers have to be certified and are dressed in masked uniforms," explained Jessica from Abide Environmental, an asbestos removal company based in Springfield.

The asbestos used in the UStore was athracite asbestos and "is hell to abate," according to Rob Quick, Project Supervisor.

The removal method being used involves the assembly of a plastic room that the certified removers work in. This process does not expose anyone to asbestos.

"Before the plastic room can be taken down, it is Massachusetts state law that it must pass an air test. Once it does, the room can be taken down," said Jessica.

"No such thing [in asbestos removal] is 100 percent, but once completed the ceiling will be encapsulated with a clear liquid," said Quick.

"Any background testing as far as asbestos in the air has come back negative. Testing inside duct work has come back negative," according to Quick. "It is being taken out to assure the safety of [Ustore] workers."

The area was deemed condemned on August 29, 2001 and will remain that way "for about 8 weeks. That's about how long it will take to remove the asbestos," Quick said.

Store Manager Phill Olson maintained that "no workers or the general public are in any danger. The air is constantly being monitored."

UStore Locations

General books, computer supplies, and health and beauty products are in the games room in the Student Union

Clothing and UMass gifts are in the Reading Room in the Campus Center

School and Art supplies are in the Textbook Annex

New amenities to the store will include a new ceiling with better lighting, a better fire detection system and air handling system as well as new fixtures and carpeting. All expenses are being paid for directly by Follet. "As a part of the contract with them, they are devoted to pay for the resources and renovations of the remodeling. They proposed to pay up to $875,000," said Paul Page, Director of Administration and Finance.

Until completion, the contents of the UStore are going to be disbursed throughout the Campus Center area. General books, computer supplies and equipment and health and beauty products have been moved to the games room located across from the Hatch in the Student Union.

"The pool tables have been dissembled and thrown into a closet," adds one UStore employee. Clothing and UMass gifts will be in the Reading Room and school and art supplies in the Textbook Annex.

Olson asks that students "be patient with us. This is a massive abatement project we're undertaking and it (returning to the store) depends on that."

As the beginning of the semester is a busy time for the UStore, whether the UStore will be financially affected "depends on the customers. Whether they are patient with us. We are trying to make it as convenient at possible. It is tough on our staff. I'm disappointed things aren't going according to schedule."

The UStore is offering extended hours (8:30 am to 9 pm, Monday through Thursday) during the first week of school.

down to Franklin Dining Commons and elsewhere to interact."

Many of the buildings in Central Residential Area were built in the 1940s and originally had their own kitchen facilities, but as the years went on, only Butterfield's program survived. "They survived because they wanted to," said Director of Auxiliary Services Ashoke Ganguli.

In 1984, with Butterfield a failing co-op on the verge of bankruptcy, the University approached Ganguli about taking the kitchen under his direction. However there were certain conditions he wanted met. Ganguli wanted each student to purchase the deluxe meal plan tat the time it was 19 meals per week) and to have the liberty to hire a professional chef manager.

Ganguli hired Phil Cavanaugh to the position and the kitchen became successful once again.

The Butterfield kitchen serviced all of the 130 residents as well as some off-campus students and Butterfield alumni. Operating from 6 am to 8 pm daily, the kitchen offered a made-to-order breakfast menu, a buffet-style lunch and a family-style dinner including fresh breads and vegetables.

"Everyone who lived there worked there," said Carrie Cappellotti, former Administrative Manager of the kitchen. As a manager, Cappellotti, a senior Communication major, was employed full-time and received free room and board as well as a salary of $360 a week. "I feel that the University thinks we're incompetent," explains Cappellotti, who expressed confusion as to why the kitchen is closing.

Where most of Butterfield was damaged by the end of last semester, the kitchen was not. "We had respect for the kitchen. Most people really respected the place," Cappellotti said.

"The building has been reprogrammed to accommodate the needs of the students," explains Gilbert. "It will be turned into class or meeting space and an academic study area."

Students who lived in Butterfield received eviction notices, but did not receive notification that the kitchen was closing. "If I lived in Switzerland," said Cappellotti, "I would never have known it was closing if I didn't read it in the Hampshire Gazette. I think housing is being rude."

Students on the Butterfield meal plan paid $1195, the same as the deluxe residential meal plan, even though students were only offered brunch on the weekends. "We were making the school money," Cappellotti said.

"There was never a problem in the kitchen with destroying property," said Cappellotti.

According to Ganguli, all equipment in the kitchen is in the process of being cleared out.

Administration prepares for cuts

By Shawn Ilnitch
Collegian Staff

The Office of Administration and Finance warns of major steps to be taken this year to accommodate a $1.8 million budget cut in the new fiscal year, which began on July first.

In a memo dated May 29, 2001, Paul Page, the Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance, warns all deans, directors, and department heads that the cuts will cause "consequences that cannot be avoided."

Page outlines the major steps that will be required, including decreased custodial staff, the elimination of credit cards as a payment option for tuition and fees, and a reduction in the number of buses.

As a result of the decrease in custodial staff, Page warns in his memo "there will be a gradual accumulation of dust, smudges, fingerprints, etc."

In addition, the frequency of trash removal will be reduced and floor refinishing and carpet cleaning will occur less often. The custodial staff will focus most of their attention on common areas and rest rooms.

The overall budget to Physical Plant is being reduced by approximately $500,000. Because of this, the planned 12-year cycle of improvements to classrooms will be extended to 20 or more years. Half of the Physical Plant's cut is coming from this program.

Overall, Page warns the cuts in Physical Plant will "create increased risk of systems failure and diminish the overall condition of the physical appearance of the campus."

According to Joyce Hatch, Associate Vice-Chancellor for Finance and Budget and Budget Director, the decision to eliminate credit cards as a payment option for tuition and fees will save the University over $500,000 a year in banking fees. Page also says that by eliminating the option, the Bursar's Office saves time, as the credit card transactions are more time-consuming than cash payments.

According to Al Byam, General Manager of UMass Transit, two busses have been removed from the campus shuttle schedule. Last year, three buses ran both southbound and northbound until 8 pm This year, there will be three buses in each direction until 5 pm, and one bus in either direction after that. The wait for a bus between 5 and 8 pm will increase from 15 minutes to 45 minutes.

The budget office is predicting their state appropriation to be $303,678,000 this year, a 3.5 percent increase from last year. They have also raised the fees on research and grant money and predict an additional $923,000 from the increase. With a small increase in out of state fees and tuition, they expect to make an additional $1.2 million. They expect their total budget money to increase 3.3 percent.

However, expenses for the year are expected to increase by 6.2 percent, forcing the budget office to cut nearly $12 million from the budget.

The biggest increases in expenses in the 2002 fiscal year budget are a $9.2 million increase in salaries, an additional $2.5 million to be spent on Peoplesoft, $1,877,000 to be spent on research investment, $1.3 million to be spent on infrastructure, and $1,682,000 spent on athletics.

"Peoplesoft" is a computer program that will integrate all finance and human resources systems here at the University. The University has been attempting to bring the system on-line for the past few years.

According to Hatch, the problem arises because the trustees have not allowed an in-state tuition or fee increase in five years. This is the second year that they will remain constant, and prior to that they decreased every year since 1996.

same rights that other public employees have, like voting on a union," James Shaw, President of GEO, said in a statement to the press. "Now they turn around and say that even though we lack the rights of other public employees, we're subject to all the same legal restrictions."

This action came as the second form of major protest this summer, the first occurring at the end of the first summer session when grades from summer classes were turned in past deadline. The grades, which were due at noon in the continuing education building, were instead turned in at 4 pm right before the building was scheduled to close.

"We all collectively turned in our grades five hours late," Mason explained. "Which is not a huge amount of time but it showed the administration that we were organized and willing to take a stand."

Approximately 80 union supporters protested outside of the building that afternoon, advocating for collective bargaining rights for Continuing Education employees and more leniency from the University in settling contract difficulties.

In addition to these actions, union members also rallied outside of UMass President William Bulger's office in Boston in an attempt to force a meeting to talk about allowing Continuing Education employees to join the union. Seven or eight protesters stayed in the building for several hours until they were finally able to get an audience with individuals within the office.

"Eventually there was an agreement to sit down and talk," Mason said.

Contract negotiations have been ongoing for many unions on campus. Agreements were reached in March with members of local union 432A and B and the International Brotherhood of Police Officers. The individual unions have already ratified these contracts.

Other tentative agreements have been reached in early June with the Massachusetts Society of Professors and the University Staff Association. The Service Employees International union, and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Workers reached their agreements in late July. GEO reached a tentative agreement with the University in early August but that agreement did not include Continuing Education instructors, nearly 80 percent of which, according to Mason, would like to be part of the union. The agreement did include a three percent pay increase across the board with two percent of additional funding being used to equalize larger pay discrepancies across the board. The tentative contract also allows for assistance for low-income graduate students in the areas of childcare and health.

The five unions who have already negotiated their contracts represent approximately 4,500 University workers.

Signs like these (above) are being found around campus as construction projects continue from the summer and spring semester and this warning of asbestos (right) can be found outside the UStore as it is being redone.

the Library. The emergency generator was installed to insure that if there were ever to be a problem with the power lines, the computer system would not fail. "There was that big, ugly generator sittin' around outside and it's gone now," Weidner said.

Many buildings throughout campus, including the Campus Center and Student Union have been renovated or improved to remove asbestos.

"Given the age of most of the University buildings, up until 1975, almost all contain asbestos in one form or another," Weidner said. "It was used in sound proofing and insulation. The University knows about it and has done the responsible thing to keep it contained safely. When we do renovation, we're changing something and we remove the asbestos first - follow state regulations. The asbestos removal is the first step."

Classrooms and auditoriums have also been renovated. Rooms in Hasbrouck, Paige and Goessmann laboratories have been upgraded, along with rooms and auditoriums in Holdsworth, Duda and Bowditch halls. There have also been new distance-learning facilities installed in the Computer Science building and a new computer classroom in Furcolo Hall.

A new box office at the Fine Arts Center was been designed and constructed in place of the old box office. "People will see a big change there," Jim Cahill, the director of facilities planning said. "It's a whole new look, it's great. People will be impressed."

Near the Fine Arts Center, of course, is the biggest construction project going on right now.

The Isenberg School of Management addition continues to progress. Completion is expected in September of next year. At that time the School of Management will have a grand facility that will include new classrooms and auditoriums with state of the art technology. Currently, room 120 is being renovated and will be completed next year as well. It will have all new seats, audio-visual equipment, and air-conditioning. "When we get done it'll be a brand new place," Cahill said.

Finally, the school is planning to construct a new engineering building, beginning sometime in November or December.

Cahill also commented on several projects that are currently on the drawing board or being studied, including construction to replace the Library deck, the Tobin deck, a handicapped parking area in front of the Fine Arts Center, and even the addition to the Mullins Center practice facility of a locker room area.

Steam line replacements in front of the Fine Arts Center and Morrill, a new nurses building, a new waste transfer facility, and lab renovations in the Graduate Research Center are also "still on the boards" according to Cahill.

Most of the University's construction and improvements take place during the summer and have already been completed, however, there are also on-going projects such as the renovation of the U-Store, the cellular towers on the top of Orchard Hill, and the School of Management construction that continue into the fall and even spring.

"There is a lot of new building going on around campus," Weidner said. "You don't see it sometimes, it doesn't qualify as 'real' building to you, but it is to us."

WELCOME BACK TO THE TOWN OF AMHERST

We always enjoy the slower pace of a summer in Amherst. But university and college students are what make Amherst a great place to live, work and play, and we welcome you back to our town – our town and your town.

Relations between the Town and the University are good, and University students continue to play a big part in that relationship. Students have always provided many volunteer services, both as individuasl and in small and large groups. Student firefighters and EMTs have provided vital services to the town for many years, and an expanded student force is helping us meet increasing demands for service. The annual, spring "Into Amherst" day has been the most visible way for large numbers of students to provide services to the town you live in. We love the Community Service Learning program. And there are other student services too numerous to mention. Thank you for your services to the town.

The Community Partnership on alcohol-related issues includes representatives of students, landlords, officials of the Town and the educational institutions, and other citizens, anbd it continues to monitor those issues. We hope that students can enjoy college life without frequent or serious alcohol-related inciednts.

We again want to give you a "heads up" about parking in and around downtown Amherst. Our parking garage is under construction, so downtown parking will be difficult during your first semester. We continue to take steps to make more parking available to meet the needs of downtown customers. At the same time, our parking enforcement officers are charged with the responsibility of enforcing parking regulations. Be aware that the fine for parking in a handicapped space or discharge lane has been increased to $100. Please abide by parking regulations and respect the job that the parking enforcment officers must do. Or use the buses that your student fees pay for, or use the new bicycle lanes and racks downtown.

Thanks again for being part of the Town of Amherst, and have a good year.

SGA readies for one more go around

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

After a year of controversy, a thrown out Senate, backroom squabbling and one large Student Government Association soap opera, members of the SGA are looking to leave the past behind them and move onto a new era of student government.

Both newly-elected SGA President John Sheehan and Student Trustee Jon Laubinger are claiming that change and moving are on the top of their priority lists for this upcoming year.

"It's all about keeping the students informed with what is going on within the SGA and on-campus and working together to build a common ground," Sheehan said. "Last year the SGA messed up and what we need to do; this year is to build focus within the SGA as well as build relationships with one another in order to succeed."

Issues such as parking on campus and YCMP are on the agenda of things to be worked on. Sheehan explained that YCMP is in the final stages of being available for freshman and sophomores in the near future.

"We are working on the nuts and bolts of the plan right now," Sheehan said. "Ken Toong, Director of Dinning Services, has been very receptive in working with us and doing what is in his power to help us with opening YCMP up to freshman and sophomores."

Parking, another issue that seems to thrive every semester at the University, was also addressed by Sheehan this past semester. Sheehan proposed a plan for numbering all the parking lot spaces on campus in order to prevent over-selling of parking permits. The plan would allow freshman to buy yellow-lot parking passes only, as well as regulate how many passes are being sold.

"In theory, with the new parking plan in effect it should be nothing near like it was last year in Southwest or Orchard Hill," Sheehan said. "It's the perfect plan if it works the way it was should."

The SGA is also gearing up for some new issues this coming year. One in particular is the communication between the SGA and Administrators.

"I'm going to be meeting with the Interim-Chancellor Marci Williams and her advisory council once a month during the fall as well as following up in the Spring," Laubinger said. "I'm also going to be meeting regularly with the Dean of Students as well as weekly meetings with Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos. Hopefully this way we will all be on a better level of understanding on the issues that are going on here at UMass."

> "As Speaker I'm not going to deal with inner room fighting. It made the SGA look awful last year and that is our big challenge this year," Saunders said. "We need to get our respect back and I know we're going to do a good job, but we're going to have to prove it."

Laubinger further explained that he plans to get more student involvement within his position by getting a task group together to work with him on issues.

"I want to get a group of students together who will work with me on decisions that I'm making as Trustee as well as so they can give me their opinions on issues on campus," Laubinger said.

The SGA Senate is also gearing up and, with a rough year behind them, newly elected Speaker Aaron Saunders and Associate Speaker Bill Powers are looking to take baby steps towards the future.

"We all have this grand vision and we know that we need to take little steps to get to them," Powers said.

Saunders agreed and explained his view of why the Senate failed to succeed last year, and what he hopes will be different this year.

"We look back at last year and we hit rock bottom, and that was mainly due to the Senate's lack of information," Saunders said. "We've been working with John and Jon on restructuring the Senate and the way that we break up into committees."

The proposed plan would break up the Senate into four sub-committees, Administrative Affairs, University Policy, Ways and Means and a Finance committee. The groups will then meet with administrators within their groups and work directly with them on a monthly basis. Saunders explained. He said that he hopes that by working together Senators will be able to be more informed when it comes to making motions and having them actually approved by the administration.

"Our main goal is to actually do something and not sit around and stomp our feet about the administration," Saunders said. "Were trying to find ways to bring the SGA closer to the student body and get them actively involved with us. The key is to make students aware that the SGA really does affect them."

Powers also explained that he hopes that this year things will move forward rather than backward within the Senate, and that he wants students to look at the Senate as a vehicle and source to solve problems on campus.

"Last year meetings would drag on and they didn't have to," Powers said. "We want to slow up the motion-making process so that we can pass effective motions as well as fully understand motions that are presented."

Issues of keeping quorum were an issue faced by last year's Senate as well as an overall lack of respect for one another. With back-room fighting ruining last semester's Senate meetings, as well as meaningless motions causing lack of quorum were all contributing factors to the ineffectiveness of the body.

> "It's all about keeping the students informed with what is going on within the SGA and on-campus and working together to build a common ground," Sheehan said. "Last year the SGA messed up and what we need to do; this year is to build focus within the SGA as well as build relationships with one another in order to succeed."

Saunders claims that this year will be different due to the fact that he plans on having the meetings more stream lined and to the point.

"Bill and I want to change the view of the Senate from just kids who sit around on Wednesday night to students who are actually involved in making changes for students," Saunders said. "The SGA is a self-justified organization, but the bulk of our support is from students and we need their support by either running for a seat in Senate, their area government or just by supporting other students in the elections."

Strong leadership has been one of the main goals on the Senate's behalf as well as within the legislative cabinet. Saunders and Laubinger both expressed their concern over the need for strong student leadership.

"There are people who want to get involved with an elected position and it's our job to reach out to them and get them involved," Saunders said.

On October 3rd Senate elections begin at UMass, and all aspects of the SGA hope to avoid last year's controversy over seat apportionment.

"Last year we changed the voting loop hole, so that now there are only two districts, commuter and on-campus residents," Sheehan said.

Saunders continued adding that there is generally a lack of commuter Senators come election time, and he hopes that will not be the case this up and coming year.

"We always want to get involvement from off-campus students and the Greek community," Saunders said.

Last year left the SGA with a tainted image amongst many students at the University, and members of the SGA claim that they want and will get the respect back. Being seen as a legitimate body and not a joke must be goal number one if any of the SGA's other aspirations are to reach fruition.

"As Speaker I'm not going to deal with inner room fighting. It made the SGA look awful last year and that is our big challenge this year," Saunders said. "We need to get our respect back and I know we're going to do a good job, but we're going to have to prove it."

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – This a good day to concentrate on the more complicated aspects of your own finances. Be sure to be on time for all appointments.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You're dealing with the things on the surface again, and though you are making progress there are certainly deeper levels to examine. Do so today!
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Erroneous reports regarding a friend or loved one may mislead you today – but with a little effort you can quickly get back on track.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Pay more attention to those close to you today than you do to yourself and you can surely help all those you touch to increase their profit and enjoyment.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Squabbles and other explosions of emotion may be unavoidable today, but any lasting effects can surely be kept at bay.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may be quite reserved and soft-spoken today – but those around you must not be fooled. Beneath the surface you're still squarely in charge!
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You may be waiting for someone close to you to have a change of heart before you finalize plans. Indeed, patience is a virtue at this time.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You may have to "break the truth" to a loved one today, and you must choose the time and the place with great care.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You must be understanding with those who are in a bind today – for you, too, may find yourself in over your head before you know it.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Avoid being too impersonal in your business relations today. A little of that "down-home" approach can work wonders at this time.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – It is essential that you remain calm and levelheaded throughout the day. Expect the unexpected at every turn – though risks are few.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – The right timing is essential today, and you mustn't lessen your chances of success by taking on more than you can handle at this time.

VALLEY GUIDE

ARTS and the Finer Things

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

As local summer seasons are coming to a close, the Valley holds unique opportunities. The influx of students to the area brings with it the beginning of the campus art season. Soon there will be countless exhibits, shows, films and performances. Whether you're a new or returning student, now is the perfect time to get out and go see some art.

UMass alone has six art galleries. And with all of this art space, there will be multiple shows going on at any given point. While your workload is light, now is the time to see the various kinds of art that this campus attracts. Not only is this art close, admission is free and open to the public. The galleries also host closing and opening receptions, often with the chance to talk to the artist.

The Augusta Savage Gallery, located in the New Africa House in Central, exhibits multicultural works. It is dedicated to showing work by artists of color, whether they are nationally displayed or local. Beginning on Sep. 1, the paintings of West African artist Issek will be exhibited.

The Central Gallery is located in Wheeler, right across from the Augusta Savage. The dorm setting lends this intimate space a casual atmosphere. It holds many shows by student and local artists. This month, artist Jeanne Marie Wasilik's paintings will be in an exhibit titled "Tableauz Silencieux." They use a realist landscape tradition, and then add imagery of drapery, which causes the viewer to question the view. The show begins on Sep. 18.

The Hampden Gallery is another residential gallery, located in Southwest. It is a larger space than the Central, with one wall being entirely windows. This allows for both a great natural light view of the art inside, and a wonderful view of art from the inside. "Other Ways of Seeing," an internationally exhibited show that features five Paris-based artists who have developmental delays, will be on display from Sep. 19 to 30.

The Student Union Visual and Performing Arts Space is located in the bustling intersection of The People's Market and Earthfoods. Look for work by student and community artists.

Herter Gallery, located in Herter Hall, has two galleries. Like Hampden, one of its walls is comprised of glass, which infuses the space with light.

LIVING From Pop Culture to Everything Else

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

For most incoming freshmen, their time at UMass is not only their first stay in the Amherst area, but also their first extended time away from home. Undoubtedly, these wide-eyed wanderers will use their newfound freedom to interact with the campus' diverse makeup and bathe in the valley's lush autumn tones.

Or, if they're like me, they'll play video games 24-7 in their dimly lit dorm room, music blasting, with a stack of rented videos on top of the idiot box. When the night sky arrives, it's time to occasionally pop out and catch a concert. For freaks like me (and those aspiring), I've got you covered with a quick guide to some of the valley's video stores, record stores, and concert venues. Keep in mind this is a partial list; I'm not the Yellow Pages, and this is just a list to get you acquainted with a few local hot spots.

There's no other group of people on the planet more opinionated or concerned with film and music than the college student. Down at the Collegian, every five minutes brings a yelling match about Magnolia, a throwdown over heavy metal, and a flipped desk over the merits of Kid A. Dorms all over campus blast music as if everyone wanted to hear it, and any given week they'll be a choice between a free showing of Gone In 60 Seconds or Central Station.

Naturally, local business caters to this passion for the arts. For video rentals, there are two vital locations. Video To Go (6 University Drive, 549-8509) in Amherst has a great selection of international cinema, from Swedish to Russian to Brazilian. Their catalog selection is also impressive, with the staples of a fine video store, namely sections for cult cinema and director filmographies. To have a video store near you with a full Russ Meyer collection is a privilege not to be taken lightly.

Similarly exciting finds are waiting at Pleasant St. Video (29 Pleasant Street, 584-6762) in Northampton. Sure, it's not the most convenient place to get to from campus, but resistance is futile; it's MOVIES. page B3

After a weekend of wild parties, some downtime may be in order. There actually ARE things to do in the area outside watching Dawson's Creek, or heading into town for coffee. Everyone knows nothing is more soothing than arts and crafts – ah, the memories of summer camp, making gimp and eating paste. The Student Union Craft Center offers classes like photography and stained glass throughout the semester for a small fee. Located in the basement across from the Hatch, all students can use the center for free and just pay the cost of supplies. Northampton's Claytopia (157 Main St. 584-9523) offers a place to paint to your little heart's content. Paint some mugs for your dorm room, or glaze a tissue holder for grandma's birthday.

For those of you who spent the summer on the course, either playing or schlepping some doctor's clubs around while he played eighteen holes, keep your putting skills sharp with mini-golf at Western Mass Family Golf Center (294 Russell St., Hadley, 586-2311). Northampton Bowl (525 Pleasant St., 584-4830) offers special Disco Bowl and Rocking Bowl nights, along with more traditional bowling for the less adventurous. Pack up your bowling shirt, and head on down.

Remember the days of couple skate, with Tiffany's "I Think We're Alone Now" playing while you cruised in a circle holding the sweaty palm of your ten-year-old love? Relive those days at Interskate at the Hampshire Mall, Rte. 9, Hadley. Interskate also offers laser tag – so round up some friends, or just head over and take out your aggressions on eight-year-olds. Skating Club of Amherst, 253-6388, offers public ice skating times, as does the practice rink at the Mullins Center, where ice skates are available for rent.

For those seniors having nervous breakdowns about what to do with their life, head over to a local psychic for some insight on your future. Northampton Astrology (7 Old South St., 587-0457) or to Psychic Readings by Crystal (249 Russell St., Hadley, 586-0455). Both offer tarot card, aura, crystal ball and palm readings.

Then there's the classic standby - the movies. At the Hampshire Mall on Rte. 9, Cinemark, 587-4233, offers stadium seating and the latest releases, along with student discounts with an ID. Northampton has two independent theatres, Pleasant Street Cinema (27 Pleasant St., 586-0935)

Clutch was among the highlights of WAAF's Big Field Day 2001.

Rammstein, Fear Factory own BFD

By Michael Delorio
Collegian Staff

WAAF BIG FIELD DAY
Meadowbrook Farms
July 14

It was the bands versus the breasts during WAAF's BFD 2001, and rock as the bands might, the breasts were usually the victor.

There had already been the first of many short rain showers when Crossbreed took the stage to a surprisingly full crowd (I missed the early acts Primer 55 and Professional Murder Music, but having seen them before, I didn't miss much). Crossbreed's techno-influenced metal is not exactly the most original approach nowadays and sharing a bill with Fear Factory, the current torchbearers for that sound, didn't shine favorably on their watered-down style. But what Crossbreed lacked in originality they made up for in execution. The high energy of singer James Rietz and keyboardists Flip and DJ Izzo translated directly to the crowd, who produced a generous pit and pumped with fervor usually reserved for later acts. Rietz's various trips offstage down to the barricade to sing surrounded by fans ensured that, even before and after they played their WAAF familiarity "Underlined," the audience was firmly in his hand.

Vancouver's Econoline Crush were a little too reel star for the metallo-kids in attendance, but their safe set won over a few fans, even if it was just Rockcherry with their balls cut off. Fuel fans need not apply.

"I never could understand how you could be more interested in a pair of breasts than me," Clutch's Neil Fallon joked after the day's first collective headspin away from the stage and towards the current female flutter. The band's musicianship outshined every other act on the bill, and the members are more than willing to get lost in a groove and air the set out at the expense of additional songs. Fallon's manic stage presence was entertaining as usual, and was full on during "Careful with that Mic..." and "Pure Rock Fury."

"We wanna thank...oh, thank you!" Boshitsar bassist Scott gushed after a topless female fan caught his eye out in the audience. But where other bands were at the mercy of their eye-grabbing flasher competition, Boshitsar steamrolled right over them with their commanding set. Their sound was equal parts Tool and Snapcase, so a crazy breakdown often gave way to more airy portions complete with flutes and acoustic guitars. The band's banger and passion were undeniable, and their hippie vibe courtesy of Scott's happy nuggets ("Don't be ashamed of your bodies, celebrate them! I love the freedom of expression here!") was sincere enough to melt even the coldest mosher.

Fear Factory, like Clutch, have been around so long that their show is a tight and beautiful thing. Sure, they have a new album out, Digimortal, but we're on familiar territory during an FF show, and they still have some of the best material around. The opening barrage of "What Will Become," "Demanufacture," and "Shock" ensures that any shortcomings down the road will be overcome by sheer momentum. Luckily there aren't any, save for maybe the slow "Dark Bodies," which kind of drags, and doesn't have the resonance of the far superior "Descent." Otherwise, they can't miss. As "Edgecrusher," "Linchpin," and "No One," which live is even better than on record, all storm by, one can only go along for the ride until "Replica" brings it all to a suitably brutal close.

"Have y'all seen enough titties?" Fear Factory's Burton C. Bell asked mid-set. After a resounding "no" from the crowd, Bell followed with "Shame ladies that's what we do." Shame frontman Aaron Lewis took the phrase to heart.

Celebs on road to recovery

Carey, Affleck begin battling back from lifestyle

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

Ah, summer: a time to kick off your shoes, relax your feet, and...enter a rehab center?!

Apparently that's the case in the entertainment biz as three high wattage stars admitted themselves in for treatment in posh rehab centers. The trend started on July 9th when Kevin Richardson, Howie Dorough, Brian Littrell, and Nick Carter appeared on Total Request Live to announce that groupmate AJ McLean, 23, had checked into an undisclosed 30-day rehabilitation program for what Richardson called McLean's "depression, anxiety, and his excessive consumption of alcohol."

News of the distressed celeb didn't come without warning, however. AJ McLean, one of the BSB's three lead vocalists and its resident rebel, had a counselor on tour with him since early June, at the urging of the other Backstreet Boys and their managers. His groupmates became worried about him when they saw him continue partying when they would go home at night, miss meetings and call times. A statement from the group added that a "key factor causing his depression was the April death of his grandmother, who helped his mother raise him in West Palm Beach, Fla.

Mariah Carey was one of many celebrities who entered rehab this summer.

Coincidentally, word of McLean's announcement comes just as the group is hitting a slump with the ADD-afflicted teen audience. While main competitors 'N Sync have been flying high with the record-setting No Strings Attached, the just released Celebrity, and a successful stadium tour, BSB's most recent album Black & Blue has sold half of what its predecessor (Millennium) sold and has fallen out of the top 100 Billboard album chart. Moreover, the guys, who postponed more North American tour dates for a second time, bypassed the stadiums they'd played last summer for smaller arenas—and still failed to sell out most of their dates.

Even worse, the internal BSB's woes have fueled speculation that the group might call it quits after the current tour although Carter told the TRL audience, "I don't think there is an end to this group until one of us dies."

Weeks later on July 26 news broke that pop diva Mariah Carey, 31, had checked into an unnamed New York-area hospital for "extreme exhaustion," just one day earlier. Carey had left cryptic audio messages posted on her official website rambling "I'm gonna take like a minute off" and yet assuring fans that "nothing's wrong."

For an artist whose multi-octave voice has propelled her to 15 No. 1 hits since her 1990 debut, the forced breakdown comes at an inopportune time. She's coping with a recent split from singer Luis Miguel. 31. Rumblings to trailers from Carey's new movie Glitter have drawn snickers from filmgoers. Pressure from the first disc in her reported $23.5 million-per-album deal with Virgin couldn't have helped matters either. Reaction (both critically and commercially) to "Loverboy," the advance single from the Glitter soundtrack, was downright pitiful. In fact, when Virgin released the song as a single they decided to slash prices to as low as 49 cents in some chains to boost sales (CD singles tend to retail around $5.99).

The trend continued on Aug. 3 when Ben Affleck, 29, voluntarily began treatment for alcohol abuse at Promises Malibu, a California facility. Affleck (whose father, Tim, is a recovering alcoholic and drug rehab counselor) isn't in lockdown at the facility, however. He is allowed to leave the complex as long as a staff member accompanies him. Showing progress, Affleck even made an appearance at the August 12th taping of the Teen Choice Awards.

How will all of this affect each artist? The Backstreet Boys certainly have to fear for an aging fan base. Further postponement will likely hurt them more as interest in the group continues to wane. Optimistically, McLean's rehab stint takes away the "boy band" gloss and shine they have tried to shed. Perhaps, the boys will actually find songs with meaning from this experience as material for their next album.

Mariah Carey has nothing to worry...yet. Her huge fan base is always there for her through thick and thin. Despite some aforementioned discounts nearing 88 percent, her avid fan base rushed out to support the "Loverboy" single and sent the song skyrocketing from No. 60 to No. 2 in just one week. The sympathy she's drawn from the highly publicized bout of rehab may actually help the Sept. 11 release of Glitter, the soundtrack (which is also doubling as her next studio album), and the Sep. 21 release of the movie of the same name. Additionally, many in her camp dismiss speculation that she's battling an addiction, which is always the toughest demon to conquer.

Ben Affleck may have a tougher time recovering. Despite having a full slate of film roles, Affleck has stated that he ends up getting into trouble when he's not busy.

Other low profile celebs have also admitted themselves in clinics. After her arrest for lewd conduct and child endangerment (charges that she denies), comedian Paula Poundstone, 41, announced she was seeking treatment for alcoholism. Metallica delayed the recording of their next album so frontman James Hetfield, 38, could tackle his alcoholism.

One question lingers: should we feel bad for these stars? A handful of stars work through sleepless days (Carey reportedly sleeps a mere three hours a night), and drugs and alcohol are the substances that fill a hurtful void, especially when a star's every move is followed day in and day out.

Still, the fortune of some of these celebs never allows them to hit rock bottom—which is an integral part to a full recovery. Celeb rehab centers, some of which charge $1,000 or more a day, are in the financial range of top celebrities and offer plush accommodations replete with perks. Furthermore, Hollywood always gives stars a second chance...only to find a short-lived recovery. So maybe the best solution to the growing problem is refusing stars a second chance.

buff's dream come true. A fine day it was when I rode home last semester with a fairly hard-to-find anime, a documentary on Half Japanese, and two shorts by Kenneth Anger.

For more mainstream movie needs, Captain Video (19 Montague Road, 549-6016) in Amherst and, of course, Blockbuster in Hadley (442 Russell, 256-4249) offer well-known catalog films and extensive new releases. And Blockbuster is the only local store that offers Day of the Warrior, a film that perches high atop any respectable 'best of' B-movies list.

A college town's merit can be measured in its record stores, and Amherst does pretty well. Mystery Train Records (12 North Pleasant, 253-4776) is the best place to start, especially if you want to get the feeling you just walked into a scene from High Fidelity. There's always something good coming from the speakers, the prices are right, and their selection of CDs and vinyl is always growing. The truly hip will need to visit The Growroom (233 North Pleasant, 549-9296), where Rawkus vinyl and Digweed bootlegs reign. Complementary threads from Ecko and Mecca complete the experience, a must for any serious DJ, hip-hop fan, or electronic music guru.

Newbury Comics (50 Main Street, 256-8040) and Fat Beats Record (104 North Pleasant, 256-6134) round out the music hunting in Amherst. For The Record's stock of new and used is consistent, and Newbury's generous selection accommodates all but the most picky music shopper.

In Northampton, Turn It Up (5 Pleasant, 582-1885) is the premier music retailer. Their local music section, reasonable prices, and good stock of used CDs are among the reasons they're usually my first stop on trips over the bridge. Elsewhere, Dynamite Records (150 Main Street, 584-1580) can help you out with vinyl and new releases, while B-Side Records (273 Main, 586-9556) has a standard mix of new and used titles.

There's no definitive spot for live music in Amherst, but between UPC (University Productions and Concerts)-sponsored shows on campus, concerts at Amherst College, and live jazz and local acts at the Amherst Brewing Company (24 North Pleasant, 253-4400), the area's never without some rhythm.

Northampton has the three major music venues in the valley. Pearl Street Nightclub (10 Pearl, 584-7771) plays host to a variety of nationally known acts, and last year their hip-hop roster was strong with appearances by Jurassic 5, Cappadonna, Dilated Peoples, and The Black Eyed Peas. The Calvin Theater (150 Main Street, 586-8686) is a larger building that showcases various international artists as well as national and local talent. The Iron Horse Music Hall (20 Center Street, 584-0610) focuses on local folk talent, but often hosts a variety of national acts in its small and intimate setting.

There it is. Turn off the damn Instant Messenger, uninstall Snood from the computer, and hit the valley up for some arts-related entertainment (to be enjoyed responsibly).

and Academy of Music (274 Main St., 584-8435).

For nature lovers, the Berkshires and the Valley offer many beautiful areas for hiking, walking, and biking. A bike trail runs from Amherst to Northampton, for avid cyclers. Skinner Mountain, can be walked or driven. At the peak are lovely views of the river, woods and houses, and an old hotel is open to walk through in the summer and early fall. The Peace Pagoda in Leverett is also a great place to stroll, for those seeking a peaceful natural surrounding.

Whatever your idea of fun, make sure you get off campus this semester and check out Amherst, Northampton and the surrounding areas. UMass life isn't the ONLY thing you should experience over the next four years.

Jam band scene flourishes in 2001

By Dave Siegel
Collegian Staff

Every summer, Northeasterners should count our prayers as we are continually placed in or very close to the epicenter of the jamband music scene. Yet again this summer, we were offered a smorgasbord of opportunities to see some amazing music, exploding out from intimate bars and clubs in the cities to larger McSheds, even to massive festivals in the countryside of New York State. In the Boston area, there were not many new bands coming around, but older, more established bands playing new larger venues. The FleetBoston Pavilion (formerly Harborlights) was the setting for many mind-blowing concerts the last few months. Beginning with a super triple bill in June with Project Logic, The John Scofield Band, and Medeski, Martin and Wood, the summer's schedule never let up with the forthcoming arrivals of Widespread Panic, Bela Fleck and the Flecktones and the String Cheese Incident.

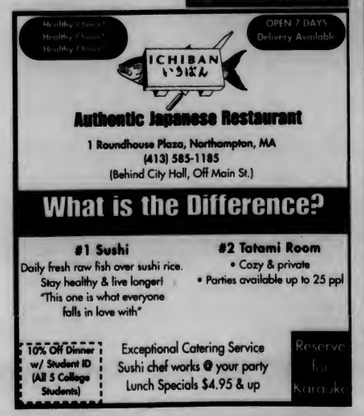
With Phish continuing its hiatus (maybe read: retirement??), there was ample opportunity for some smaller bands to make waves. The band that in my opinion made the biggest strides in this region is the String Cheese Incident. If you backtrack to last summer, String Cheese had their largest Northeast performance when they played all three days at Berkfest. The following Fall, they returned to the East for their famed Halloween run of shows, which ran through New York City, Boston, our very own Northampton and off to Portland, Maine for an amazing holiday show. This was a big step for the band as they sold-out the entire run, establishing a massive presence in the area. The String Cheese Incident is a five-piece act that formed in 1993 in a small ski village in Colorado. Very quickly their popularity rose as they soon conquered the larger city of Boulder, Colorado before spreading out towards the West, especially Oregon, and California. They then slowly made their way East with a few mini-tours, but not officially establishing themselves in the area until last summer.

This summer, I had the opportunity to see them perform three times: once at the Fleet Boston Pavilion and twice on two consecutive nights at the first annual Summit Festival in Upstate New York. Although String Cheese always put on a solid performance the last night at the Summit prevailed in my memory as the standout set that crossed over my ears and eyes. On this particular night, they began the night with a graceful "Rollover," worked up the intensity through an amazing set that included great versions of "Got What He Wanted," "100 Year Flood," "Black and White," and a sick "Come As You Are" before segueing back into the ending of "Rollover." They ended the show with my personal favorite, "Restless Wind," which made for a sweet ending to an amazing festival.

During the summer there are a number of festivals, which give music fans an opportunity to see many bands in a short period of time. My first festival of the summer was The Gathering of the Vibes in Red Hook, New York held June 29th through July 1st and produced by Terrapin Presents. Although many people disagree with me, I honestly believe that the problems of this festival were beyond the control of Terrapin.

Although there could have been a little better communication, three massive storms on three consecutive nights would ruin any festival or concert no matter how thorough the planning. The way that Terrapin dealt with the rain was by calling off the music and allowing shorter performances by some of the scheduled bands once it was safe for the massive crowd to return to the concert field. I am grateful to them for allowing me to see some great music including Les Claypool's Frog Brigade, The Disco Biscuits, a Thirty Year Tribute Jam commemorating the deaths of Janis Joplin, Jimi Hendrix and Jim Morrison, Max Creek, Dickey Bettes Band, Bruce Hornsby, the John Scofield Band and MMW to end the festival.

Because of the weather problems that occurred, Terrapin was gracious enough to allow for a discount on tickets purchased for The Summit Festival to be held later in the summer.



The Summit was held in Mariaville, New York, which was held August 17th through the 19th. The single problem that I found with this festival was the super-thorough search of cars at the entrance, which resulted in a long traffic jam within a mile of the festival gates, which took almost 6 hours to get through. Once inside, every single detail was taken care of, including the handing out of free bottled water during the hottest day of the festival. When we finally got into the festival, we were lucky enough to be able to see Friday's headliner Government Mule.

They played a killer set with frontman Warren Haynes and bassist Oteil Burbidge (both of Allman Brothers fame) ripping some amazing solos. On Saturday my day began with an incredible set by the John Scofield Summit Project, which featured Billy Martin (MMW) on drums. They loosened up with some classic rock standards beginning with the Stones' "Satisfaction," into Creams' "Sunshine of Your Love," and finally into the Beatles' "Day Tripper."

Short of that aforementioned String Cheese set on Sunday night, this set was my most memorable. On Saturday we were also treated to the Jazz Mandolin Project with Jon Fishman (Phish) on drums, some funky stuff by the classic Funky Meters, some hip-hop from a solo Rahzel followed by the Roots, and finally a closing set by String Cheese Incident. Granted there was no foul weather to create problems again, but I cheer Terrapin for putting on a great string of festivals.

I can say that I was treated to one of the most memorable summers of music ever. This fall should turn out to be just as memorable with a whole slew of great shows lined up for Northampton. Keep tuned to the Collegian for continued coverage throughout the semester on the growing local jamband scene.

From the Editor

"The future's so bright.' Well I'd look ahead but it burns my retinas." –J.S. Clayden/ J.A. Carter (Pitchshifter)

Fall 2001 is going to be an amazing time for Collegian Arts & Living. It is my goal as the new Arts editor to make sure that everyone on campus interested in pop culture and fine arts picks up the Collegian every day to check out the Arts section. Whether you have an interest in film, music, fine arts, television, the local arts scene, campus personalities, or anything else Arts-related, the Collegian has the talent and resources to bring a fresh and intelligent perspective to those things that keep you going.

My biggest hope for this fall semester of Collegian Arts is that the campus really gets involved in what's happening in our pages. This can be done in many ways. We're always looking for new writers, so everyone is always welcome to come down to the Campus Center basement and become a part of our staff, either as a regular or sporadic contributor. There are more movies, CDs, events, concerts, books, television shows, etc. than our staff could ever cover entirely, so come down and help us dedicate some space to the Arts that you want to read about. And no one ever works at the Collegian for any period of time without grabbing some free stuff.

Even easier, and just as important, is for our readers to come down and tell us what they think of the Arts section. We look forward to you stopping by the office or emailing us at collegianarts@yahoo.com and telling us what you love or hate about our reviews, columns, or coverage. From personal experience, I can tell you the Arts staff loves to whittle away the hours in the day arguing over music, movies, and all aspects of pop culture, so feel free to come down and share your opinion. Esteemed assistant news editor Rob Schulze and I are always up for talking about the world of metal, including the questionable merit of Blaze Bayley-era Iron Maiden, guaranteed.

Also, if there is something happening on campus or nearby that you think deserves coverage, come by and tell us. We have our eyes and ears open, but we can't catch everything.

By the same token, we are all college students down here just like you, so you'll have to forgive us if we don't have the staff or time to cover every arts event on campus. We all put 100% into the paper every day, but we can only be so many places at once.

That said, we have a very talented staff of returning writers this fall bringing all sorts of experience and outlooks to the Arts page. The two Assistant Arts Editors this semester, Julie Burrell and Shauna Billings, both have outside experience, journalism and Collegian backgrounds that have them nicely overqualified for their positions.

Arts has also reshuffled some of our existing talent for the upcoming semester. Kurt Polesky, illustrious former Collegian Boy Band Expert, will be taking over Tube Notes, while former Tube Notes columnist Nicholas Pizzolato is prepared to give a fresh perspective to The Source.

David Siegel, an expert in the jam band scene that remains lively in the valley and nationwide, will be expanding his views into a column this fall. Nikolas Markantonatos, who has contributed many pieces on current entertainment industry news, starts a column this semester dealing with various headlines and trends in pop culture.

There will no doubt be more changes and additions to the Collegian staff as time goes on, and as readers like you come down to the office and contribute. The Arts department looks forward to your readership, input, and participation throughout the Fall Semester.

Janet's overt sexuality is showcased on All For You.

All For You introduces a sexier, raunchier Janet

By Nikolas Markantonatos

JANET JACKSON
All For You
Virgin

Dammit, Janet! What happened to the lovable girl-next-door persona of yours from the sitcoms Good Times and Different Strokes? What happened to the days when you were singing "Let's Wait Awhile" to a boyfriend trying to get on second base?

Apparently, our now 34 year-old Janet is all grown up. Welcome the new curmudgeonly, yet still adorable, Janet. On All for You Janet has once again enlisted old comrades Jimmy Jam and Terry Lewis, who have worked on every one of her albums since Control in 1986. All for You saw the subtraction of producer and ex-hubby Elizondo and the addition of producer Rockwilder (Jay-Z, Busta Rhymes). Although Elizondo's presence didn't play a part in the crafting of All for You, Jackson surly found the source of material (her anger and disappointments) through her relationship with her once significant other.

The claustrophobic sounding "You Ain't Right" kicks off the album with drum machines and synths while Janet begins her ranting of a parasite. One can't resist from shaking his hips while listening to Miss Thang's falsetto voice and syncopated rhythm.

"All for You," her tenth no. 1 Billboard Hot 100 single, contains everything we've come to expect from Miss J.—it's a butt shaking romper, a throwback to old-school disco, lacquered with a thumpy hook. This time she employs vocal alterations that warp her voice into a virtual doppelganger.

Jackson's a newly reborn, sexually liberated, single girl on "Come On Get Up." Her lively singing combines with a dynamic mix of jungle drum rhythms and driven, dance club keyboards.

Jackson shows the pace on "When We Oooo" as she breathily coos "can't get enough of you." But the track doesn't contain enough carnal lyrics to ignite any real passion. The formula works to a better degree on the sizzling, R-rated "Love Scene (Ooh Baby)" where Jackson naughtily coos "as your hands move slowly/ up my thighs/ you taste the honey." Jackson once again ups the ante in "Would You Mind" where she lustily drifts into a soft core fantasy: "I just wanna/ kiss you, suck you, taste you, ride you/ feel you, make you come too." But besides the scorching lyrics and moaning, the song provides little else through aural pleasures.

All For You's best track is, undeniably, "Trust a Try." It's fast pace, guitar riff, and nasty lyrics give the track an avant-garde characteristic. The song shows much of Jackson's capability as a creative artist. If only she would create an album entirely composed of such original pieces would she then take her career to the next level.

Another standout track is "Son of a Gun (I Betcha Think This Song is About You)," which samples Carly Simon's "You're So Vain," and where Miss Jackson gets serious. Instead of sexually charged lyrics she uses obscene language and lashes out on others as she sings, "thought you'd get the money too/ greedy mutherfuckers/ try to have your cake/ and eat it too." (With such racy lyrics and testy language it's surprising All for You wasn't slapped with a parental advisory sticker.) Spoken word from Simon laughably name-dropping various cloud formations only incites the song further. The twice-divorced pop diva who has been in the business for over 20 years has surely made many enemies along the way. But the song is probably aimed at her most recent divorce from Rene Elizondo Jr. who is suing her for $10 million in damages, asking for some assets and property they acquired together.

Set against a whirling up tempo dance groove and Jackson's voice sounding fresh as ever, "Someone to Call My Lover" is an irresistible summer anthem. Also included on the album is last years release "Doesn't Really Matter," another superb Jackson ditty.

For every great song on All for You, there's a disappointing one. Jackson's musings about her topsy-turvy personal life translate into so-so tracks. Still, Janet Jackson is one of the few international icons that can still entertain the masses. Her recent string of success is a testament to her savvy marketing techniques. Last summer, Nutty Professor 2, in which she starred alongside Eddie Murphy, took in more than $175 million at the worldwide box office. "Doesn't Really Matter," off the Nutty soundtrack, added another no. 1 hit to her arsenal. In March, MTV's inaugural "mtvICON," the network's tribute to musicians who rate the title, made her status official. With the All For You blockbuster world tour in high gear and All for You an already multi-platinum album Jackson is a force to be reckoned with.

Savvy electronica elevates Celebrity

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

N'SYNC
Celebrity
Jive Records

It was probably a good time to check the temperature down in hell last summer when N'Sync's new album Celebrity actually got positive reviews from music critic after music critic. After checking the conditions, hell was still warm and toasty with no sign of freezing over just yet. The truth was N'Sync managed to put together a solid album of R&B/Euro dance pop (whatever that is), that pleased their fans and silenced their critics forever (OK...plenty of people still think they suck).

If this new album really is "Dirty Pop" - as Britney Spears' boyfriend and the guy who got to "make out" with Beyonce (lucky guy...huh), Justin Timberlake puts it - then what were N'Sync's first two albums? The truth is N'Sync's third effort does represent a more advanced and mature sound than their first two efforts. The progression has been a first album of bubble gum pop, a second album of straight up pop, and a third album of dirty pop. OK, in reality there is nothing dirty at all about N'Sync's music. It's still almost as wholesome as it gets. But Celebrity does represent a pop sound with far more R&B influence and experimental (at least to American teen pop music) beats than has ever been seen before.

The album kicks off with the ultra-fast dance-happy first single "Pop." The track, which was written by Timberlake and choreographer Wade Robson and produced by underground electronica wizard B.T., sets the tone for the album: cool beats accompanied by simplistic lyrics.

While the production is excellent on the entire album, the lyrics that were written by Timberlake and band mate J.C Chasez are often laughable in their simplicity, and their obsession with making consecutive lines rhyme. Case in point: the Neptunes-produced track "Girlfriend," where Justin spouts, "I Don't even know why you care/ He doesn't even know you're there." Or the chorus of "Why don't you be my girlfriend?/ I'll treat you good."

Even so, the strength of the production is more than enough to carry the album. The Chasez-produced tracks all hit in this sense. "Game Over" features a squeaky Pac Man-esque sample, and the happy go lucky track "The Two of Us" features a beat that sounds like it was sampled off of "The Ringling Brothers" soundtrack, if there is such a thing. The jumpy "Up Against The Wall" -with some inspiration from Craig David and the U.K Garage Movement - also succeeds with it's catchy beat laid over quick biting words.

The main difference between the Chasez and the Timberlake produced tracks (if your wondering what the other three members of N'Sync - Lance Bass, Chris Kirkpatrick, and Joey Fatone - do, the answer is not much other than collect their paychecks and dance around in concert) is that the Chasez-produced tracks have a more dance flavored and at times overproduced feel to them. Timberlake's tracks are basic R&B numbers that sound like songs churned out by today's R&B stars like Usher, 112, or R Kelly.

From the melancholy lyrics to the stellar production, to the angst-driven tone of Timberlake voice, the track "Gone" is by far the best thing any "boy band" has ever done in terms of producing a genuine non-popish R&B song. It's easy to see the Michael Jackson influence in his track – "See Right Through You" -so much so that the track could easily be mistaken as one from the "King of Pop" himself.

A noticeable thing about Celebrity is that aside from "Pop," which is the catchiest thing on the album, is that the N'Sync-produced tracks tend to outshine the tracks produced by the all star production crew that was brought on board. The Rodney Jenkins-produced title track "Celebrity," is adequate, but certainly not among his best work. The slow ballad "Selfish" - produced by Brain McKnight - is a pleasant love song, but is a throwback to N'Sync's "God Must Have Spent A Little More Time on You" days, with its cheesy wedding reception type lyrics, and McKnight's constant plays on phrases and words that is his hallmark.

Buried in the album are two tracks produced by the Swedish production team that has brought the world virtually all the hits from N'Sync, Backstreet, Britney etc. "Tell Me Tell Me Baby" sounds like "It's Gonna Be Me Part 2," just not as catchy as the original, complete with Timberlake pronouncing "me" like "may." "Just Don't Tell Me That" is brought to us by the two people that brought us "Bye Bye Bye" with similar results as an attempt at recreation of the previously mentioned song. The tracks rewind N'Sync's sound back to No Strings Attached, and provide a dose of the flavor of pop music that has been common these past few years.

One striking aspect of Celebrity is that it's hard to pick out another bona fide radio hit on the album. Most of the tracks are actually...and this might come as a shock to some...a little too advanced and different for Top 40 radio. It's obvious that N'Sync has tried to make an album of quality music from start to finish rather than simply produce radio hits. No doubt to the surprise of many, they have succeeded in doing so.

U2 blazes through Boston

By Matt Despres
Collegian Staff

U2 with P.J. HARVEY
FleetCenter
June 5-9

At six o'clock, tick-tock, we were welcomed in, ten hours of waiting behind us and another five and-a-half to go before the night could suitably be called.

And sometime after 11 p.m., as the last were being ushered out of the heart, it was: U2 had delivered, on a stripped down scale that still seemed larger than life, exactly what they had been promising since picking up three Grammy's earlier in the year: great music, less irony, and ideals that had set more than 18,000 fans loose into the city of Boston for one beautiful summer week.

Not that the bombast of the legendary Irish quartet has been completely discarded. As the band – guitarist The Edge; bassist Adam Clayton; drummer Larry Mullen and vocalist Bono – hit the bright stage to the opening strains of "Elevation," the simple gesture resonated into the waiting arms of the fans. "Here we are," they seemed to say as The Edge blasted towards the songs furious conclusion, "we know that you'll enjoy the show."

Enjoy they did. Bono kept the banter to a minimum and made room in the drivers seat for the rest of his mates, all substantial pieces to a successful equation. The superbly crafted "Beautiful Day" received considerable attention from the audience, almost certainly guaranteeing it a spot in future U2 tours. In fact, a good portion of the bands' latest, All That You Can't Leave Behind, acted as the evening's foundation. "Stuck in a Moment that You Can't Get Out Of" the beautiful "Kite" and even "New York" debuted as mature, full-bodied versions of the recorded adolescence we have already seen on disc.

However proud they are of their musical ability some 20 years on, U2 has refused to shy away from the warhorses, and rightly so. The gems they mined from two decades of existence have continued the band on a path of not only widespread appeal, but of artistic growth and pride. For every step taken into electronic-laced territories like Zooropa and Pop, there is an even greater shift back into a classic sound that continues to grow after all these years.

"Sunday Bloody Sunday," "I Will Follow," "Pride," and "One" managed to cover a wide musical/emotional range of the group's heyday, particularly "Sunday," which the group had once sworn off from their live performances.

U2 struck its largest chords when it dipped into The Joshua Tree on two occasions, pulling out a lingering "With or Without You" and "Where the Streets have no Name," which poured forth from The Edge's guitar, and remains the signature moment of the live show.

Not willing to rest on well-worn and trusted devices, the band pulled out a number of tricks: impromptu versions of "People Get Up" and "Party Girl" at the request of the audience, and a last night "Out of Control" that floored the building. Bono's solo, one verse rendition of The Beatle's "In My Life" and dedication of "In a Little While" to the late Joey Ramone helped to bridge the gaps, by taking parts of our personal memories and selves and turning them into something whole that transcended the moment.

The show hit its highest peaks, however, and there were many, when the band adopted some of its famous swagger and went full-throttle with the theatrics. A the waiting arms of the fans. "Here we are," they seemed to say as The Edge blasted towards the songs furious conclusion, "we know that you'll enjoy the show."

"duel" between The Edge and Bono during "Until the End of the World" left Bono on his back, kicking wildly at the guitar, while the singer chased his "Got to go" line in "The Fly" on the second night with a dive off the tip of the heart, emerging from the crowd near the back of the building.

The first encore of "Bullet the Blue Sky" came packaged with a short, anti-gun video, and came to a haunting end as Bono ran the course of the heart with his spotlight in hand, referencing both John Lennon and the increasing level of handgun violence in the United States.

And that was as far as the politics were allowed to go. Keeping the songs to the forefront and the crowd increasingly happy, the band marched forward and achieved the impossible: making the FleetCenter seem, for a few nights at least, like an intimate living room party, with 18,000 or so of your closest friends.

Opener P.J. Harvey couldn't have been better. Sexy, strong and talented, she led her band through a different and equally impressive set list each night. Though the FleetCenter was a bit large for her brand of Rock 'n' Roll, her no-frills performance was the perfect precursor for the main event.

Sugar Ray continues pop domination... seriously

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

SUGAR RAY
Sugar Ray
Atlantic Records

Sure, Sugar Ray released their fourth full-length album this summer. But, by any measure, they're still considered lightweights. Previous infectious hits such as "Fly," "Every Morning," and "Someday" showcase the group's talent for radio friendly tunes. The first release from their self titled third album, "When It's Over," carries on these pop tarts with similar semblance—little in content, but big on catchiness. Not that this is necessarily a bad thing. Sugar Ray's songs qualify as some of the best pop songs ever.

Sugar Ray know that they're not taken as seriously as a real band in the music biz where their longevity is often put into question. In fact, they titled their last album 14-59, pointing out that their 15 minutes of fame are all of one second away. The group doesn't have to worry just yet. Their last two albums have each gone several times platinum, and their current effort is destined to match the success of their predecessors.

The Southern California-based quintet masterfully mixes elements of pop, punk, hip-hop, reggae and new wave on Sugar Ray. The songs were written by all five members: Frazier, hunky lead singer Mark McGrath, guitarist Rodney Sheppard, bassist Murphy Karges and DJ Craig "Homicide" Bullock. Although the new album, which admittedly is a more guitar (often sounding like Blink-182 style-punk) and drum driven album, is supposed to showcase the group as a rock band, the songs still come up as summery, easygoing radio songs. Still, the heavier sound does give the group a quality missing from most of their earlier work—it makes them sound like a band.

"When it's Over," blending a mid-tempo shuffle beat with a macho baseline, a sing-songy hook and unfussy vocals from lead Mark McGrath, became one of the best songs of the summer.

"Answer the Phone" hears the pleas of a heart torn lover to reconcile with his girlfriend. The song, with strong guitar licks and drum lines, is edgier than the tracks from their previous albums.

"Under the Sun" only affirms that Sugar Ray is the unmistakable summer band. "Do you remember summers that lasted so long?" and "do you remember all of us together as we grew up under the sun?" asks McGrath, his voice lacquered in a smooth, slow drum line.

When Sugar Ray tries to delve into serious subject matter, such as in "Waiting," It's sadly overlooked for their regular sugary fare. The track shimmers with a bolt of yearning, power-pop that comes complete with smart, self-referencing lyrics from McGrath.

Sugar Ray is a perfect summer album. One that is ideal for blaring on the car radio with the windows rolled down. With so many rock bands taking themselves and their "art" so seriously, and where every lyric is analyzed and dissected by music critics, modest Sugar Ray is a welcome contribution to the music scene. A band that puts out great pop songs and doesn't take themselves too seriously? What more can we ask?

Historical inaccuracies detract little from the power of Pearl Harbor.

Pearl Harbor an uneven mix of history and fiction

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

PEARL HARBOR
Directed by Michael Bay
Starring Ben Affleck and Josh Hartnett

Sure it's been a few months since the screaming engines and falling bombs have turned our favorite theatres into a fiery, nightmarish wasteland of burning ships and wounded bodies. But, in the tradition of Don Reid and Sammy Kaye, we'll remember Pearl Harbor. With it's 75 million dollar opening on Memorial Day, this Jerry Bruckheimer production quickly seated itself among the top grossing movies of the year, but the wannabe epic has several problems.

"Pearl Harbor is an epic love story set in the days when nations made the devastating leap from peace to World War," the pre-release press kit stated. And when it comes to the devastating war part of that sentence director Michael Bay did a fine job. Pearl Harbor would be a wonderful movie if it weren't for the main characters mucking it up.

The film follows two pilots, Rafe and Danny, boyhood friends who have stuck together through thick and thin. Rafe, played by Ben Affleck, is the alpha friend, who usually leads Danny into trouble. But Danny is the smarter one played extremely well by Josh Hartnett. And to further dampen Danny's self esteem Danny's father, shattered by the horrors of Great War France, is an abusive alcoholic. So, in the great tradition of Yogi and Boobsco, we have a wonderful pairing of intelligence, sensitivity, inner strength, and Ben Affleck.

Randall Wallace's story follows the pair from their childhood and into their enlistment in the United States Army Air Corps, where Rafe applies for the "Eagle Squadron," a collection of foreign (non-British) pilots to assist the Royal Air Force in the Battle of Britain. However, before Rafe sets sail to protect our limey cousins he meets Nurse Evelyn Johnson, played wonderfully by British actress Kate Beckinsale. After Rafe fails his vision test, he can't read- he relies on his boyish charm to move Evelyn to pass him, and while trying to put one over on her, succumbs to her Nicole Kidman meets Liv Tyler beauty.

A whirlwind romance ensues, and it becomes quite clear that Rafe and Evelyn are more than just a "I'm going to war, let's screw" hook up. But all things must end, and Rafe ships out to jolly old England, with promises to return.

Oddly enough, Rafe's illiteracy doesn't stop him and Evelyn to trade letter after letter, and as their love grows, the audience falls for the couple. And when Rafe is shot down, his last thoughts of Evelyn, the audience is truly stunned.

Meanwhile, back in the States. Or more appropriately, in the territories, for Danny and Evelyn have been transferred to the massive military base at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. When news of Rafe's demise is reported back, the two are devastated, and exist, seemingly, in separate worlds until a chance meeting outside a theatre. In mourning their friend, the two seek solace in each other, and a relationship develops between the two.

The only problem is that Rafe isn't dead, and when he shows up telling his pulled-out-of-the-English Channel-by-French-fisherman story, Danny and Evelyn don't know what to do. Danny is glad to have his friend back, but Evelyn is torn between the two, and Rafe resents both for their relationship.

As if matters of the heart aren't bad enough, across the Pacific Japanese war leaders are planning a crippling attack on the Oahu base, in hopes of breaking an oil embargo that is severely hindering their country.

As the preparations for the day of infamy commence, Rafe and Danny struggle to salvage their friendship. After passing out in a car after a bar fight, the whining engines of Japanese warplanes awaken them.

This is the part I was waiting for- the actual attack. I can only describe it this way- chills. Seriously. Repeated, icy cold chills running up and down my spine as bomb after bomb fell, as fire billowed up from crippled ships, as sailor after sailor died.

The attack seems to last forever, as swarms of Rising Sun planes blot out the sky and as thick, oily clouds of black smoke roll across the harbor. Average men become heroes, as personified by Cuba Gooding Jr.'s portrayal of Dottie Miller, a mess steward turned anti-aircraft gunner.

But the lead characters are scrambling- Evelyn to the hospital, the boys to their planes. And still the horror of war continues. The wounded begin to flood into the hospital, which suffers damage in the attack. The boys manage to get up into the air, and start fighting back- that bolsters the spirits of the audience- who have just witnessed the utter destruction of the Pacific fleet's battle fleet. Scenes start jumping around now. There are some highly touted (by Touchstone Pictures anyway) scenes with a heavily made up -but still recognizable- Jon Voigt as Franklin Roosevelt, trying to decide what to do in the wake of such a devastating incident.

The retaliation from the United States comes in the form of the Doolittle raid- Army bombers, piloted by our heroes, Danny and Rafe, into the heart of Japan. The mission is fraught with peril and sure enough, Danny and Rafe go down in a blaze of glory. Only one makes it back to Evelyn's waiting arms.

The film, on the whole, is decent. The acting, particularly by Hartnett, Beckinsale, James King and Tom Sizemore, is very good. Randall Wallace's story has holes you could pilot a Zero through, though. For instance, Rafe's illiteracy doesn't seem to stop him from writing love letters to Evelyn.

The major problem with the film is that it tries to do too much. Pearl Harbor sets out to be a love story, a war story and a period piece, and fails to do any of the three perfectly. The love story, by itself, is good. The period piece, by itself, is good. And the war story, by itself, is fantastic. But in trying to do all of them, it accomplishes little except to send the audience on a roller coaster ride of expectation- you never know if the next scene is going to be a history snap shot, an explosion, or a kiss.

If the film stuck to the story its title spelled out for it, that is if the film was simply about the great attack, the audience would have been happy, and the film would have been stronger. As it is, the audience sits through two hours of character development before anything really interesting happens.

Wallace's script also broadly paints out parts of history, while adding in some touches of modern day political correctness. [illegible]

Roosevelt is shown making a point of his disability, and without his trademark Chesterfields. And try as they might, Bay and Bruckheimer just can't hide Jon Voigt. His character isn't true to FDR's nature, and comes across very much as someone playing FDR.

The character of Dottie Miller is introduced, seen once or twice, and then ignored. There is a final voiceover by Kate Beckinsale, which goes on to tell us what happens after that. It's tacked on at the very end, and it feels it. It's out of place with the rest of the film, and doesn't really fit. A more fitting ending would be some shots of the Arizona memorial, or pretty much anything but a voiceover.

There are other problems with the picture. Alec Baldwin plays air hero Jimmy Dolittle, but plays it over the top. Every line Baldwin spouts sounds as if it got cut from a John Wayne movie.

Historically, there are all kinds of problems. The WWII planes are beautiful (if off by a couple of years in some cases), but they are treated like racecars, zipping through alleyways and pulling tight corners.

There are several ships in Pearl Harbor that definitely don't belong- you can clearly see the missile launchers on several ships which, incidentally, are blown up first. No soldier fought in all three battles (Britain, Pearl Harbor, and the Dolittle Raid). The Raid itself is presented oddly. Instead of the well balanced, all sides look like we got at Pearl, we see kimono wearing women and desperate workers trying to shoot down the American B-25s. In addition, the movie makes the Raid out to be worse than it was. It was much more of a morale booster than a significant attack. In addition, only 13 airmen were lost in the raid - eight being captured, three died while bailing out. All 16 airplanes were lost. One managed to make it into the USSR, where the plane was [illegible] and the crew arrested. Four crashed landed in China, and the other eleven crews bailed out over China. None of the planes made it to the airfields. Of the eight that were captured, three were executed, and one died in a prisoner of war camp. Of the 62 men that crashed or parachuted into China, 12 would be killed later in the war. The point is none of the Raiders were killed on the ground in China by Japanese infantry, as depicted in the movie.

It's strange though, because except for the main characters, everything is really well done. The Doolittle raid- Alec's over the top performance aside- is right on, down to the Japanese friendship medals attached to the bombs and the broomstick machine guns.

The hospital scene, shot from the point of view of a wounded officer, is wonderfully done, and does what Spielberg's camera work on Omaha beach did: It puts the viewer there, in the moment.

The actual attack itself is downright scary, and one can only imagine how bad it must have been to actually be there. The Japanese planning scenes are spot on, down to the formal ministry speech of the officers. Basically, the best way to learn anything from this film is to ignore the main characters and watch the background and the supporting actors. It's tough to be critical of a movie that tries so hard to be right and yet falls short of the mark, but it definitely gets an A for effort, C plus for conduct.

Rapping white guys who don't suck

By Rob Schulze

NULLSET
Grand Royal

Rap-metal has been in decline since it began. No release has ever managed to match up with Rage Against the Machine's first album from 1992, but recently the standards have declined so alarmingly that even wimpy frat boy crackers like Crazy Town have managed to score radio hits. It's pretty sad.

That's why it comes as such a shock these days when an album comes out that combines rap, metal, and not sucking. Ladies and gentlemen, Boston's own Nullset.

Nullset's live shows are locally legendary, and for good reason. The band on stage totally transcends their recorded material becoming greater than the sum of their parts. Their previous recordings: an indie album, some mp3 demos, and a three-song EP have all been quality enough, but not doing justice to the material as performed live. The fear that this, the band's major-label debut, would be grossly inadequate was rampant among Nullset's fan base. Of course, it isn't prefect, but it definitely isn't a disgrace to the shows. A solid, top-level rock release, Nullset should win some new fans to be blown out of the crowd at the next show.

To be honest, Nullset isn't a new beginning in the rap/rock world. In fact, it doesn't really break all that much new ground in any manner except for the innovative guitar work. What it does do, however, which is so unique today, is present twelve good songs that, while not blazing any trails, blaze up the speakers for a good forty minutes and then go away without leaving a bad taste in your mouth.

When the band hits best is when it just all-out rocks. Jim Foster is capable of busting out crazy riffs like they're nothing, and bassist Jim Shippy can back it up with low, pounding lines that shake the floor loose. On songs like opener "This Ain't California," "Speechless," single "Smokewood," and "Complacent" the band just goes for the nuts and hits 'em square where it counts. Vocalist Ken Smith raps his way at a punk-like warp speed about any number of things, some of them cool ("I see through you, acrobatic static melodramatic"), some of them funny ("Can I get another bong hit... up in this piece!") and some simply random ("Sing along become a by-gone McTwist indecision up over the rims of my goalie"). These songs are great, built to rock the radio, the party, the live show, and whatever else may come along.

Where Nullset loses its spirit is on the several songs where the band heaps scorn on trendy rap-metal bands. Now, this could be taken as a simple case of unintentional irony, but it isn't – Nullset really isn't a Linkin Park boy band, they have done their time in the trenches and have earned their popularity with blood and gigs in slimy New England clubs. It's just that the aggression doesn't really work so well for this band; they're best songs are upbeat, and their live show is more of a fun time than a mosh-happy suicide fest. "H Bone" has a great riff, but the "We're so real and all the other bands are trash" lyrics kinda kill the fun. The best way to expose bad music for what it is is to just shut your mouths and write better songs, which these guys do when they aren't busy complaining about MTV.

A good entry into the rap-metal sweepstakes, Nullset proves that the genre does not have to dumb and dilute itself out of existence. With a sense of humor, killer guitar work, and an overall product that works both as a rock record and a party album, the band has taken another step out of New England and towards nationwide badassery.

Now get your ass to a show.

Madonna's Drowned World Tour rolled through Boston this summer

Madonna drowns Boston

By Nikolas Markantonatos

MADONNA'S DROWNED WORLD TOUR
August 7

Since she last hit the road for a world tour the Queen of Pop has spawned a pair of rikes, exchanged wedding vows, and put out two of her finest albums yet, Ray of Light and Music. Finally, after waiting eight years,

Madonna dusted off her saddle and rode into one of the most spectacular tours of the year.

The Material Mom donned four distinct personas that have characterized her chameleonic image of the past several years and used Cirque du Soleil spectacles to create a dramatic showmanship of her songs in Drowned World Tour 2001.

The highly imaginative and theatrical show was also characterized by stunning choreography, striking video, and artful, although minimal, set design. The result: a mind-numbing spectacle of aural and visual bravado from one of the world's most eminent artists.

Out are the days of schlock-shocking audiences with her exploration of kitschy sexiness circa her "Like a Virgin" era. Madonna now looks to amaze and thrill with her spiritual (Ray of Light) and ghetto-funk cowboy swinging (Music) metamorphoses.

Madonna first emerged out of the smoke-drenched stage on a rising platform as a punk diva, complete in worn-out black garb and burned tartan kilt. Examining the "Drowned World/Substitute for Love" performance it's presumable that this is where the matriarch first drew the analogy between ravaged landscapes and her soul-killing obsession with success (the overall theme of the tour).

She later went into "Impressive Instant" which showed off her sporadic dancers—10 in all, in jackboots, Mohawks, and gas masks—hurtling across the stage when they're not chasing or humping the bitchy, strutting Madonna. While performing a hammering "Candy Perfume Girl" Madonna flips the bird as she punches out power chords (admittedly quite well) on a Les Paul guitar. "Do I make you horny baby?" she shouts out to the audience before she rips into a pole-humping "Beautiful Stranger". Dark roots peeking through her bottle-blond hair, Madonna continued to cavort onstage as she sang "Ray of Light."

Faster than a speeding light Madonna transforms into a geisha for a Butoh Japanese sequence in which she rises center stage in a black and red kimono with an astonishing 52-foot sleeve span. Silhouettes of scorched trees against racing clouds of blood red illuminate the set's 38 video monitors, creating an emotionally chilling and vulnerable mood during her performances of "Frozen" and "Mer Girl."

Continuing this theme of female empowerment behind the haunting set, a sword-wielding samurai chases Madonna during "Nobody's Perfect," where he eventually cuts off a lock of her raven-hair. The Empress of Pop turns aerial for a soaring 'Crouching Tiger, Hidden Madonna' theatrical performance for a battle with a samurai during "Sky Fits Heaven."

The evening's most shocking moment came during an outfit change as horrific images of a bruised and battered Madonna flickered on the video screens, followed by her appearing on stage armed with a shotgun and shooting her abuser for "Mer Girl." As another costume change was under way the audience was treated to a cartoon montage depicting women fighting, being abused, sexually objectified, and eventually raped during "What It Feels Like for a Girl."

The third chapter in Drowned World Tour 2001 plays out Madonna's Musica era get-up—a playful cowgirl complete with rhinestones, cowboy hat, bell-bottom leather chaps and jacket. "I Deserve It" once again allowed Madonna to show off her skills as a guitar strumming diva. Later she rides into a hip-thrusting, leg-kicking urbanite during the country-western two-step "Don't Tell Me."

Madonna strips off the tight leather jacket and reveals an American flag tank top ready to lap-dance a mechanical bull during "Human Nature." She continues her pre-'98 exploration with "Secret," accompanied by a beautiful black and white montage of riverside baptismals and the well-sung "You'll See."

In the evening's fourth and final act Madonna turns into a Flamenco/Ghetto Fabulous diva. She sports a Spanish-style black, backless dress with complicated crisscross bra straps over hip sling pants for a candle-adorned and tender-hearted Spanish rendition of "What It Feels Like for a Girl." Her performance of "La Isla Bonita" affirmed that she dipped her feet in Latino music long before Ricky Martin shook his bon-bon to a worldwide Latin craze.

Her ghetto fab vignette was replete with a fur coat and rhinestone T-shirt that read "Mother" on the front and "F*cker" on the back. The look welcomed two of the biggest hits of her 18 year career—the ancient hit "Holiday" and confetti shooting and flashy encore of "Music," which showed a video collage of her past—marking the only time Madonna was willing to go nostalgic.

The concert showed off her love of metaphysical adjustment, playing off her favorite themes of spirituality, individuality, self-expression, and sexuality. She asked for forgiveness but has "absolutely no regrets," Madonna, who surprisingly seemed at ease on stage, has turned from a strict showbiz obsession and turned to love and motherhood and family.

Despite a cancellation of a New Jersey show just days prior to the Boston performance due to a severe bout of laryngitis, Madonna's voice was in fine form. Strong and prodigious, no doubt due to the vocal expansion she received during her Evita training, her vocals have never sounded better.

As Madonna turns 43 her energy level barely seems to vanish. Never did she pause to catch her breath nor did she slow down during her high-power choreography. Her appeal to audiences is just as incredible. Teens to the elderly were taken aback from the electrifying spectacle and her robust life force and intelligence.

The show clocked in at a respectable (especially for a solo artist) 105 minutes, filled with an extravagant 22-songs. The most audible complaint from the near 20,000 fans at the sold out arena was the lack of Madonna's oldest hits. But this wasn't a greatest hits tour—Madonna has time for that later. For now she's only willing to stun audiences with her latest forays in music and to better stress her career's one constant: change.

THE PRICE OF GLORY

Football, field hockey feeling the burn as seasons approach

Putting the 'iron' in gridiron

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

You know the thought. Everyone knows it. It is that self-motivational notion that tomorrow morning you will rise at the crack of dawn and scamper five miles because it's healthy and it will make you a better person. Then, as the sun rises and the exasperating alarm resonates through your eardrums at 6 a.m., your eyelids feel like free weights while your pillow beckons you, all but muting the vain undertones of your running shoes and gym shorts.

Athletes have these thoughts, football players especially. But what separates the gridiron warriors from the armchair quarterbacks of the world is sweet and simple: motivation.

Do you think that running 100-yard hill sprints in full equipment in the dead of August is just some kind of bizarre hobby that the not-quite- human football jocks engage in? Are you under the assumption that the soldiers of Saturday employ 400-pound squats and 300-pound bench presses for the sheer love of burning hands and sore muscles?

Football players are susceptible to the same mental crutches and inspirational flaws as any other self-respecting couch potato. But the key to leaving laziness in the dust is taking the negatives of daily life and converting them into aggression toward reaching one's goal.

Every player has his own source of inspiration, and for star safety Jeremy Robinson, hints of doubt from the media are all that he needs.

"That's the key around here," Robinson said. "To take that [media] criticism and turn it into aggression."

With the pessimistic prospects of a rebuilding year looming over Massachusetts football, the senior and defensive captain takes every disparaging article as a pep talk geared toward running that extra sprint and doing that extra rep in the weight room.

Robinson has tunnel vision, with victory in his crosshairs and a mentality to dominate. Two years removed from the miracle championship run in 1998, the senior and his sleek new defense has refocused on one goal and nothing, not even health, will get in their way.

"No pain. We have no pain," Robinson said. "All our injuries, nicks and hurts, we are turning that all into motivation."

After two years of wallowing in Division I-AA mediocrity, a final shot at glory has Jeremy Robinson motivated.

On the other side of the ball, senior tailback Kevin Quinlan has his inspiration for an improved work ethic. After three years of understudy duty sitting behind All-American Marcel Shipp, Quinlan's time is now.

"Being behind [Shipp] made me work harder," Quinlan said. "It gave me motivation."

Quinlan and Robinson are two seniors who are in their fourth tour of duty under strength and conditioning coach Bob Otrando, and the benefits are clearly visible.

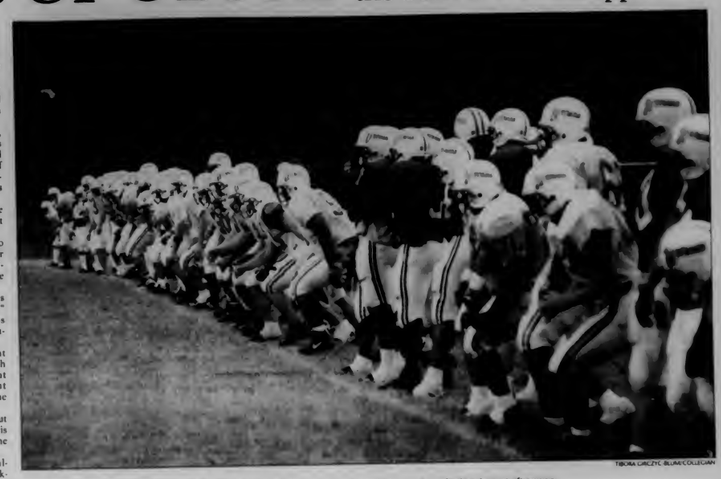
"When Jeremy got here he was something like 170 pounds," Otrando said. "Since then he has gained about 30 pounds and is usually around 200."

Robinson's increase in weight and strength has a lot to do with the carefully laid out regimen that Otrando has implemented, but much of the credit must go to the senior's unwavering dedication.

"Jeremy attended every workout this summer," Otrando said. "He is one of the hardest workers on the team," and it shows in workouts.

As a freshman he was just a talented toothpick, now he is a freakish specimen with a 38-inch vert and a 4.43 40-yard dash. Add those flashy figures to his 290-pound bench press and his team high 460-pound squat and it's almost like UMass has the Frankenstein monster playing safety.

Otrando's summer workout is a soul tormenting, physically demanding marathon that puts every nook and cranny of your body through a six week torture machine – you'll be a better man for it.



"Everybody on the team needs to get stronger, faster and more explosive," Otrando said. "No exceptions."

A typical week of summer workouts is as follows:

Monday: A punishing degree of curls, bench presses and various other upper body workouts. And to cool down, why not do some distance running?

Tuesday: Your lower body is feeling left out so let's introduce it to power cleans, squats and the always popular Romanian dead lift.

TIBORA GINCZY, BLUM COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts football team, in full gear, unites for its end-of-practice suicides, on a sweltering August afternoon.

The crossroads of success

The Massachusetts football and field hockey teams are both striving to reach the pinnacle of their respective sports – though they have seemingly started heading in opposite directions over the past few seasons. While field hockey made its second-straight trip to the NCAA Div. I quarterfinals last year, football slid a little further down the Div. I-AA totem pole by missing the postseason for the first time under head coach Mark Whipple. Below are the two teams' records and thirst-ate outcomes from the last three seasons:

YEAR	FOOTBALL	FIELD HOCKEY
1998	12-3, 6-2 Atlantic 10 Won national championship	14-8, 6-1 A-10 Lost to Penn St. in NCAA 1st rnd.
1999	9-4, 7-1 A-10 Lost to Georgia Southern in NCAA D. I-AA 2nd rnd.	13-8, 7-0 A-10 Lost to UConn in NCAA 2nd rnd.
2000	7-4, 5-3 A-10 Missed postseason	20-4, 7-0 A-10 Lost to UNC in NCAA 2nd rnd.

TIBORA GINCZY, BLUM COLLEGIAN

Meanwhile, in the slighty cooler confines of Weight Room 1 in Boyden Gym, senior co-captain Kerry-Ann Jaggassar and the field hockey team hit the weights.

Will hours of sweat spell moment of glory for UMass field hockey?

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

"Pain is weakness leaving the body."
-U.S. Army Ranger School Cadence

It is not unlike the burn of lactic acid in a sprinter's calves or the soreness of muscle fibers ripped apart by a set of curls. But it hurts in a different place, perhaps a little deeper inside, and it lingers longer than any ordinary soreness.

It's the burn of falling short of your own expectations. And no one is feeling that burn quite as much as the Massachusetts field hockey team.

The Minutewomen shot into postseason play last year like a comet, having won 11-of-12 regular season games down the stretch and limiting their Atlantic 10 foes to one goal – total – in five games.

After torching the A-10 tourney field, it took a 5-1 loss to North Carolina in the NCAA Quarterfinals to finally cool off the Maroon and White.

All of which left the Minutewomen burning for another shot at reaching the Final Four – something that hasn't happened since 1992.

And if the team's off-season workout regimen is any indication, Head Coach Patty Shea's troops are ready to turn that burn into post-season glory this year.

"The whole key to improving is how hard you work in the offseason," Shea said. "Your growth and development before the season starts is what determines how far you'll go, and I think this group is really excited about their potential."

The end of the regular season is just the beginning in terms of player conditioning for the Minutewomen.

The team practices from 6-8 a.m. from February through April, and engages in 3-4 dates of interteam competition in that same period (NCAA regulations allow up to five).

The team takes May off before heading into its summer regimen, though by then many of the players are chomping at the bit to get back on the turf.

"Our goal with all the spring work is to gain improvement and get the players excited for summer conditioning," said Shea. "That makes it a lot easier for them to work through the summer, knowing how much fun the season is going to be."

A majority of the players serve as coaches at the White Mountain Sports Field Hockey Camp, held during the summer at the Deerfield Academy. The camp, aimed at teaching high school aged players the ins and outs of upper-level hockey, also gives the Minutewomen a view of what it's like on the other side of the player-coach fence.

"We understand what our own coaches go through," senior co-captain Jill Fantasia said. "We learn what it's like to have to repeat everything over and over and feel like no one's listening to you."

The team's summer training program is split into three phases: endurance, middle distance and sprints.

Through a combination of weight training, running and agility exercises, the players work toward achieving game-shape conditioning and explosiveness by the start of the regular season.

One would think that by the time preseason double-sessions roll around in August, the players would be somewhat sick of all that working out.

But according to sophomore goalkeeper Ashley Egland, working up a sweat becomes just as natural as washing it away.

"It's like taking a shower – you don't question it anymore," Egland said. "In fact, on days you don't work out you actually miss it."

Working into optimum shape also helps to keep another of an athlete's natural enemies – the injury bug – at bay.

It has long been an athletic creed that stronger bodies are less apt to break down in mid-season, but off-field training today also offers a good alternative to on-field drills and exercises.

Whereas extra reps on the Astroturf can strain and fatigue overworked muscles and ligaments, players can do specialized exercises in the weight room on state-of-the-art equipment that builds strength while cutting the risk of injury.

"I've been working out on an elliptical trainer at the gym," senior forward Lindsey Abbott said. "It allows you to work a lot of muscles without putting too much pressure on your knees and shins."

But make no mistake, the pressure is still there – it just comes from within the players' own minds and hearts.

Having steamrolled through the conference five years running and scratched the surface of the last five NCAA tournaments as well, the Minutewomen are burning for a chance to break their Sweet Sixteen curse and reach the Final Four for the first time in eight seasons.

And that's a gain worth an eternity of pain.

ATLANTIC 10 FOOTBALL PREVIEW

As September approaches and the sun rises over a new football season in the Pioneer Valley, you can almost hear the voice of Michael Buffer.

Now entering the ring, with 11 teams and a wide-open tussle for the title...the Atlantic 10 football conference. Let's get ready to rumbbbllleee!!!

Keeping with the modern age tradition of A-10 football, the competition for this year's conference championship and the subsequent playoff berth will be nothing less than a battle royale.

"Anyone can win the league," Massachusetts coach Mark Whipple said. "That has been proven throughout its history."

With all eleven teams in the red zone for a run at the title, it could be the healthiest team, not the most talented, that wins out in November.

"The two factors in this conference are injuries and who can win on the road," Whipple said.

Hofstra, if it can stay healthy, is my pick to finish first in the conference in its inaugural season in the league. 2000 co-champions Delaware and Richmond are on the heels of the Pride as each returns a strong nucleus from last year's postseason squads.

With the graduation of superstar tailback Marcel Shipp and All American linebacker Kole Avi, Whipple's young but talented Minutemen sit in the preseason no. 4 spot.

Rhode Island, Northeastern and Maine look to again be the cellar dwellers of the league, but with the right match ups and Cinderella stories the conference is famous for, who knows what could happen.

So the A-10 puzzle has its favorites and its underdogs, but who is to say that the bottom feeders of the preseason won't be the frontrunners of November. For a clearer picture of the conference read on, but remember the only sure thing in this league is that someone will win it...I think.

Hofstra Pride

Coach Joe Gardi's offensive triumverate of QB Rocky Butler, RB Trevor Dimmie and WR Charlie Adams make the Pride the team to beat. Last year Butler picked up right where Giovanni Carnazzi left off by throwing for 2,772 yards and 25 TD's in his first season as a starter.

Fellow senior Adams was the hot target in an offense that scored 445 points a year ago. Adams caught a team high 74 passes for over 900 yards and 11 TD's. Dimmie, the featured runner, complemented the air attack with 1,640 yards on the ground.

The defense may not be as flashy as the big time "O", but they are just as dangerous with two sport All-American (football/lacrosse) Doug Shanahan (7 INT's) and Ryan Fletcher (7 sacks) leading the ball hawking Pride.

Hofstra is stacked on both sides of the ball allowing them to immediately slide into the role of Atlantic 10 bully.

Delaware Blue Hens

One team that might take exception to Hofstra's one-year takeover is national powerhouse and perennial conference contender Delaware. Despite the loss of lethal passer Matt Nagy, coach Tubby Raymond has a core group of key players returning from last year's 12-2 squad that lost to National Champion Georgia Southern in the NCAA semifinals.

Game breaker Butter Pressey (682 yards, 9 TD's) returns while wideouts Ianin Elliott and Brett Veach return with their 116 combined catches. The question mark is at QB where Nagy has left some huge shoes to fill.

If there was a weakness in Delaware's game last year it was the defense. Then again, it is hard to call a unit that allowed less than 250 points a weakness. Linebackers Dan Mullvern (142 tackles) and Darrell Edmonds (84 tackles) are the team's top returning tacklers while DS Jameer Rasheed is back romping receivers in the secondary.

Overall the Hens are a step behind Hofstra in terms of talent, but sheer skill is not what wins football games.

Richmond Spiders

The Spiders were a few notches better than anemic on offense in 2000 but they managed to score enough to go 7-1 in the conference and share the title with Delaware.

Double dangerous signal caller Sean Gustus returns to lead a Spider offense that threw the ball only 111 times last year. The senior earned a 153.73 QB rating thanks to his rarely used but accurate arm while the bulk of his production came on the ground. Gustus ran for a team high 1,043 yards and 8 TD's. Combine that with explosive tailback J.R. Purnell (487 yards) and the Spiders have a one-two punch to be reckoned with.

The bread and butter of this team is in a defense that allowed only 112 points in conference last year, good for tops in the A-10. All-America candidate Josh Speaker and his 80 tackles lead Coach Jim Reid's fast and aggressive "D".

Richmond proved last year that defense can dominate in this league so don't expect the formula to change in 2001.

Massachusetts Minutemen

Redshirt freshman Matt Guice is coach Whipple's golden boy. If he smoothes out the rough rookie corners and consistently produces, then an offense filled with talented receivers will simply take off.

Even with star wideout Adrian Zullo redshirting, the Minutemen are still knee deep in flankers. With all the injuries a year ago DeShon Hardy stepped up and caught 27 passes and with skilled speedster Jimmie Howard healthy, the passing game should put up some big numbers for UMass. Senior scat back Kevin Quinlan (698 yards) and Central Florida transfer Omari Howard will take over for departed RB Marcel Shipp.

One would think that a defense that lost two All Americans in Brian Smith and Kole Avi would struggle the following year. Well believe it or not the expectations are even higher. Jeremy Robinson (4 INTs, 75 tackles), one of the nation's best safeties, returns to lead a young but extremely fast defensive squad. Super-soph Valdamar Brower (5 sacks, 57 tackles) must continue to improve and Whipple must answer some questions at linebacker and corner back. If all the pieces fall into place this could be a very formidable unit and a very dangerous team.

Villanova Wildcats

The 'Cats have the best all around threat in the nation in Brian Westbrook (2,992 all purpose yards). He is a legitimate pro prospect who just blows away anybody else in I-AA as far as catching and rushing.

Second team A-10 QB Brett Gordon is back and has the job of feeding his star tail back. "Now decided it wasn't important to play much defense last year so the "O" will have to score in the 60s. The fact remains the Wildcats can only go as far as Brian Westbrook can carry them.

William and Mary Tribe

The Tribe are led by one of the best quarterbacks in the conference in junior David Corley. Corley was lethal last year as he completed more than 55% of his passes for 2,565 yards and 15 TD's. The junior's favorite target is WR Rich Musinski who caught 44 balls in 2000. Marcus Howard provides a double threat out of the backfield as he had 32 catches while running for 543 yards.

The defense allowed a forgettable 314 points last year but will look to improve with the return of Mohammed Youssofi (108 tackles) and Chris Stahl (3 sacks).

James Madison Dukes

Injuries decimated what could have been a great season for the nationally ranked Dukes. This season does not have quite the same prospects, however. JMU returns only two starters on defense although one is leading tackler Derick Pack (136 tackles).

The Dukes will have to rely on an offense that averaged over 28 points a game a year ago. JMU's top returning run threat is Brannon Goins who gained 687 yards despite his 5-foot-6 frame. JMU is 11-0 in its last eleven home games.

New Hampshire Wildcats

The 'Cats have a prime time running back in Stephen Lewis who ran for 981 yards and caught 51 passes for coach Sean McDonnell's offense. The man feeding Lewis the rock is QB Ryan Day, who also hooked up with WR Brian Mallette for 28 completions.

Defensive End Jon Oosterhuis is the man on defense for UNH and that may not be a good thing. He is the top returning tackler with 58 that ranked him just 7th on the team last year. That doesn't bode well for a team hoping to compete in an offensively gifted conference.

Maine Black Bears

Watching the Bears play offense can make you sick to your stomach, but try to score on them and you better bring an oxygen tank because you may have trouble breathing.

Maine returns nine starters to a dominant unit that allowed less than 15 points a game in its last five contests. Linebacker Stephen Cooper (5.5 sacks) hunts down quarterbacks like they're in season while LB partner Rob Kierstead is a menace in the box.

The Bears should keep games close with their stingy "D", but a sputtering offense will have coach Jack Cosgrove's squad lost in the A-10 basement again.

Rhode Island Rams

The spread offense. No one knows its intricacies better than Tim Stowers. He won a national title with it at Georgia Southern in 1990 and Rhody fans are praying for only a glimpse of that success.

The country got a sneak preview last year when the Rams trounced fake-A Connecticut and put a scare into conference powerhouse UMass. Now for the sequel.

If you don't know who David Jamison is now, you will find out when he runs roughshod over your team. The man is a 215-pound wrecking ball who bruised his way to 1,121 yards last year. Double threat signal caller Vince Nedimyer is back after a 1,000-yard passing/ 700-yard rushing year. Stowers returns all of his favorite tools for dismantling A-10 defenses. Memo to defensive coordinators: Beware the spread!

Northeastern Huskies

The Huskies return only one-half way decent player in DB T.J. Hill who led the conference with eight picks last year. This is fitting for a half way decent program with a half way decent facility and a half way decent scoreboard that might not have enough digits in the opponents' scorebox.

Linebacker Joe Gazzola (104 tackles) returns to a defense that stopped nobody last year, save Division II powerhouse American International. Hopefully Dom Brown and his Huskies are used to the damp and cold A-10 basement, because nobody is going to throw them a ladder in 2001.

As of right now the picture is clear. You have your conference frontrunners in Hofstra and Delaware. You have you're A-10 stepping stones in Rhode Island and Northeastern. Finally, right in the middle of the conference melting pot you have UMass and a lot of question marks. But never has the saying "that's why we play the games" rung truer than in the Atlantic 10 conference...where anything can happen.

Lappas, Minutemen get head start on foreign soil

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

It was a nice gift, a cordial offering per se. And more importantly, under NCAA rules, it was a legal one.

A seven-day, four-game Grecian hoop tour, commencing in Athens and ending on the Greek Isle of Mykonos – it wasn't a bad premiere for Steve Lappas, the newest head coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

"Tremendous," Lappas initially described the August European adventure.

"It was great trip in a lot of ways. It was great from a getting together standpoint and getting to know the guys. It was also great to get a head start like that – showing them a lot of the things that we want to do that will make the first week of practice much easier.

Under NCAA regulations, schools are allowed to take a trip east to the trans-Atlantic continent once every four years. But before takeoff, the school is also allowed a precursor of ten practice days. Lappas used eight of those days as his orientation, all of which featured double sessions.

"My goal of practice that week was not to go play these games in Greece," Lappas said. "My goal in practice that week was to get us ready for October.

"We practiced hard here, we were going twice a day for a week. But when we got [to Greece] we just played the games and had fun."

Lappas planned the Greek vacation four years ago, while still in his coaching stint at Villanova. But UMass athletic director Bob Marcum agreed to pick up the check – around $100,000 – when he hired Lappas, about a week after the resignation of James "Bruiser" Flint.

The overseas excursion is just the first of many heads-up basketball decisions that Lappas and his staff will most likely make in the near future. The Atlantic 10 conference welcomes eight new coaches for the 2001-2002 season. Seven of them won't be able to run their squads until Oct. 13, Lappas has already set his blueprints.

"I saved us a tremendous amount of time," he said. "I thought that it at least gave the guys a chance to find out how I like to play and then what kind of style we're trying to play. And I thought they did a pretty good job of trying to adapt, considering it was only a week."

This guy knows basketball, and loves it even more. How can you tell? In every which way he talks and breathes hoop. There's just something about the way he carries himself.

On March 26, 2001, a request was placed on his new desk in the head coach's office overlooking the parquet, high atop the William D. Mullins Center. That appeal: "Please Steve, let us return to the days of Mr. Calipari. You know, the days when all 9,493 Mullins Center seats would sell out weeks before the game, when students would skip class to get tickets. You know, the days when March was just the beginning."

No pressure, coach.

Sure, it's a challenge. But it doesn't seem like Lappas is too nervous. It's a new beginning with new players, but it's the same old game that he has succeeded in for many, many years.

"I really don't know what Bruiser's system was, to be honest," Lappas said. "I purposely didn't want to watch tape because I didn't want to get an opinion of these guys before I saw them do the things I want to see them do."

Ah, the signs of patience and wisdom. The stuff that builds and re-builds programs. Oh, but there's no need to jump the revolutionary musket any longer, because it's only September. In Massachusetts, only results utter importance.

What we have now is an uncontaminated specimen. This year's squad will look nothing like last year's 15-15 roller coaster. There's no "superstar" that will be hyped to the death and then eventually, fall over, this time. There isn't a head coach, so very afraid to fail, that his in-game decision-making will be affected for worse, this time. And this time, a realistic schedule beckons the Minutemen.

Shannon Crooks is back for his senior year, and will probably be playing the most time at two-guard. Fifth-year senior Kitwana Rhymer and junior Micah Brand are both back and will be of the utmost importance in the paint. Seniors Eric Williams and Jackie Rogers will back up the duo.

Sophomore Anthony Anderson, UMass' first natural point guard since Edgar Padilla, will add much-needed strength to the backcourt. Marked academically ineligible last year, Anderson has already impressed Lappas with his on-court presence. A coach lives and dies by his point guard. So when Anderson isn't on the court, look to Lappas' immediate right or left – he'll be there.

Look for freshmen Kyle Wilson (White Rock, B.C.) and Brennan Martin (Rancho Santa Margarita, Calif.), both of whom Lappas recruited at Villanova, to make sudden contributions, at the one place UMass struggled from the most last season – behind the three-point arc.

"The one thing we're not, is a real good shooting team," Lappas said. "And that's going to be a big thing for us.

"But [Wilson and Martin] are both very good shooters. Kyle Wilson also has a very good feel for the game – smart player, very good shooter. Brennan Martin is 6-foot-7, he's pretty athletic and he's also a pretty good shooter."

Boston native Raheim Lamb rounds out the list of newcomers for the upcoming season. And at 6-foot-5, his strength and athleticism could pose a certain danger to opponents at the small forward position. Lamb will be competing with returning senior Ronell Blizzard and sophomores Willie Jenkins, Jameel Pugh, and Dwayne Killings for time at the small forward, off-guard positions.

Who will start on Nov. 16 against Arkansas-Little Rock? Coach has no clue.

"I'm going to have to make some tough decisions," was all he could offer.

In Greece, Lappas played everyone equally, and floored

Minutewomen revel in role of the underdog

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

In the "Underdog" cartoons that ran in the early 1960s and late 1970s, the title character is an unlikely superhero in the form of a scrawny dog in a baggy costume. Shoeshine Boy's alter ego carries a ring containing a vitamin pill that gives him superpowers, which he uses to fight crime.

The Massachusetts women's soccer team is labeled as an underdog for the 2001 season. The player's uniforms, however, do fit. The vitamins they took over the offseason, combined with a rigorous weight program, have left them anything but scrawny and with the super soccer skills they need to fight opponents.

The Maroon and White struggled though an injury plagued 2000 season, clawing its way to an overall record of 11-7-1 (7-2-1 Atlantic 10). The impressive in-conference record earned UMass a No. 5 seed in the A-10 tournament where it fell to No. 2 Xavier University in a 1-0 heartbreaker. Despite returning 9 of 11 starters and earning five preseason all-conference and rookie honors, the A-10 coaches' preseason poll placed UMass in fourth and clearly established the team as an underdog in achieving its goal.

"Our goal is to win the A-10 [championship] and thereby go into postseason play," coach Jim Rudy said.

An addition to the conference has made that goal much more difficult. The Richmond Spiders are the clear favorites to come out on top in their inaugural A-10 season, but Rudy looks at the addition of the former Mid-Atlantic Conference powerhouse as a terrific addition to a conference that has concentrated on merely basketball for too long.

"It improves our strength of schedule index, which is really critical for this conference," Rudy said. "I think it's wonderful. They have a good coach and a good program and I'm all for it."

The "underdog" Minutewomen are overlooked by the rest of the league due to last year's health questions and the graduation of two solid seniors.

"We graduated two goal scorers and I'm not sure people are looking at us as a front-runner this year," Rudy said. "Although I certainly am, and so is my team."

Sophomore Erin Lilly's injury problems disrupted the team throughout most of the 2000 campaign. The talented forward suffered two separate injuries that forced Rudy into juggling the lineup.

"We started the season with two midfielders playing the front and then [forward] Kara Green had a ruptured right quad that she was playing with," Rudy said. "We never could get any consistency up front. With [Lilly] being not up to snuff and Green playing left-footed, we would dominate some games and not win. We didn't score when we were good enough to win. Erin will add to that."

The 2000 A-10 All-Rookie Team member was disappointed with the way her season turned out, which she expressed to Rudy during the end of season interviews. She told Rudy that she wasn't herself, and that he would see the real Erin next year.

The 20-year head coaching veteran has been pleased by his young forward's preseason.

"We didn't see the true Erin Lilly [last year]," Rudy said. "[Now] she looks like the Erin Lilly that we recruited. She's fit, enthusiastic, and healthy. She looks good."

All health questions have been quieted for the time being, according to Rudy. "No one is coming in with any major injuries from the summer," he said. "Right now all we have is just the normal wear and tear."

Improved health and a very good freshman class will add needed depth to the front line as Rudy inked two forwards expected to become very good collegiate athletes.

"We have two very gifted incoming freshmen, Erica Wideberg and Stephanie

The future has arrived

The Massachusetts' football team must travel a tough road in 2001. But it will look to carry on its storied tradition against the odds.

Young Minutemen bring positive outlook to formidable slate

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

The members of the Massachusetts football team sauntered into the locker room adjacent to McGuirk Alumni Stadium at around 3 p.m. on Aug. 27. Most took the walk without an ache. But others, as the sport sanctions now and again, gave in to a few limps before entering the facility.

Alas, senior free safety Jeremy Robinson, one of the nation's top defensive backs, strolled in with a half-cast on his right hand.

But he was quick to end the panic.

"It's just a broken thumb," he said, shrugging it off. "I won't be wearing this thing for the [William & Mary] game."

That manner, in fact, holds entirely to Robinson's motto for this 2001 season.

"No pain," he said with a confident smirk. "We've got no pain.

"The injuries, little nicks, hurts, and all that stuff – we're turning it all into aggression."

Two seasons have passed since the Minutemen's 1998 title run – a shock to the bystanders of Division I-AA football (because of the Maroon and White's 2-9 record the previous year). And UMass, let alone Robinson, won't hesitate to remember the lack of respect they encountered going into that crowning campaign.

"In the '98 season, everyone was counting us out and we won the National Championship. I think this season is very similar – the key is to take all the criticism and turn it into aggression.

"We feel that we can play with anyone."

Credit the optimistic approach to coach Mark Whipple and his staff. For a young team, with experienced leadership – on and off the field – the key to success, Whipple says, is execution. He's not about to spend all week fretting about his opponent's strategy. The only variables he knows he can control are the ones donned in maroon and white uniforms.

This year, there is a spotlight on finishing each play. This year, there is a focus on carrying out UMass football.

"We really inundated them with football [in camp]," Whipple said. "We were here from 6:30 in the morning until 10:30 at night, they went and slept and came back for more football. I think that we practiced at a high level all the way through camp and were more physical than we've been the last two years."

Don't anticipate the Minutemen's second title in four years – the schedule is brutal – but don't predict an Amherst disaster either.

The men in maroon have surprised you before.

Last season, UMass finished 7-4 overall, and 5-3 (3rd place) in the Atlantic 10. Offensively, it remained among the conference leaders, with 28.4 points and 402.7 yards per game. The Maroon and White defense surrendered just over 297 yards a game and its pass defense led the league allowing just under 160 yards per session.

The position-by-position breakdown is as follows:

QUARTERBACK

Redshirt freshman Matt Guice will get the starting nod as the Minutemen begin the 2001 season. Guice, who threw for over 2,000 yards and 25 touchdowns in his final year at St. Thomas Aquinas High School in Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., beat out junior Kelly Seibert for the position. Seibert started four games last year, going 48-for-85, for 491 yards with 3 interceptions.

"Matt's been able to escape some pressures and make some things happen in the run game, which has kept the offense on the move and made some first downs," Whipple said. "He's young and he's going to make mistakes but he's handled the mistakes he's made, which is why I've given him the nod."

RUNNING BACK

Whipple will call on two senior tailbacks this season in hopes of successfully replacing All-America tailback Marcel Shipp. Kevin Quinlan, Shipp's back up for the last three years, carried the football 150 times for 686 yards last season to bring his career totals to 277 rushes for 1,406 yards with 16 touchdowns.

University of Central Florida transfer Omari Howard will join Quinlan in the backfield. In three years with the Golden Knights, Howard ran for 605 yards and scored nine times.

"Kevin Quinlan at tailback has really done a great job every time he's been asked and Omari Howard has really come along and played well in camp," Whipple said. "So I think we've got a good one-two punch and we'll alternate those guys and get them pretty much even reps."

Senior Pete Cariello will start at fullback for the third straight season. One of the A-10's best fullbacks, Cariello caught 20 passes last year for 295 yards and two touchdowns.

"He's made big plays and we need to find a way to get him the ball in space," Whipple said. "He's been a fairly physical player in our running game, so he's solid as a senior leader."

RECEIVERS

Senior Adrian Zullo, who tore his anterior cruciate ligament in the fifth game last season, will redshirt this season. In his three years for the Minutemen, Zullo has caught the football 135 times for 2,130 yards and 23 scores.

"It's the best thing for him," Whipple said. "He's good enough to play some, but he won't be as good as he will be next year, so we'll save him.

"But we're pretty deep [at wide receiver]. I just hope we can stay healthy, unlike last year."

Senior DeShon Hardy and junior Jimmie Howard – who also tore his ACL last year against Hofstra – will most likely lead this year's crop of talented receivers. Hardy came up big for UMass last season after Zullo and Howard went down with injuries, taking in 27 throws for 370 yards.

The speedy Howard, who Whipple said is at "full strength," has caught 14 passes in 15 games, for 266 yards. Along with his starting role on flank, he should also see time as a kick returner.

Junior Greg Ward returns as the starting tight end for the Maroon and White. Last year, he made four receptions for 40 yards. Sophomore Eugene Young and redshirt freshman Sean Young will fight for the backup role.

"They're all better and they're playing better, so they all should be involved in the pass game more," Whipple said. "They're good targets and they just understand things better. Last year, the tight ends caught six passes the entire year, and in the Spring Game they caught seven."

OFFENSIVE LINE

DEFENSIVE LINE

Sophomores Valdamar Brower and Doran Davis will direct the defensive line this season for UMass. Both outstanding pass rushers, Brower totaled 57 tackles (11 for loss) and five sacks in his freshman year while Davis made 36 tackles and six sacks in a backup role.

"Doran and I are the only ones on the D-line with experience," Brower said. "So I just need to take more of a leadership role. I need to be a little more vocal and just can't let my head loose like I did last year."

Junior Khalil Blakey and redshirt freshman Adam Waters will most likely start at the defensive end and tackle position, respectively.

LINEBACKERS

Trying to fill the void of graduated All-American Kole Ayi in starting roles will probably be junior Corey Potter and sophomores Jeremy Cain and Mike Ziccardi. Potter made 49 tackles last year, and Cain was right behind him with 45. Ziccardi, a transfer from Connecticut, dragged down 36 men in 2000 for the Huskies.

Sophomore Mark Kimener and redshirt freshman Leron Ancle will also see playing time at the linebacker spots.

SECONDARY

The defensive backfield is probably the strongest part of this year's defense.

"It all starts with Robinson and (Eddie) Bowman, the two seniors," Whipple said. "Those guys have played very well."

Robinson, a three-year starter at free safety, and one of the nation's best, made 75 tackles last season, grabbed four interceptions and broke up eight passes. Bowman, a former wide receiver, made 18 tackles last year at defensive back.

Joining Robinson is junior Anton McKenzie at nickel back who made 42 tackles and six sacks last year. Senior Bill Barry and sophomore Ryan McHugh are also available for time at safety.

Joining Bowman at cornerback is Nate Long, who played running back last year. Sophomore Rob Williams and redshirt freshman Leroy Brooks will provide the back up.

"[Nate] can run," Whipple said. "He's probably the fastest guy on the defense."

SPECIAL TEAMS

Junior David Sanger returns as the starting punter, and will attempt to better his 39.4 yards per punt average from last season. He also placed 14 punts inside the opponent's 20-yard line. His strong kicking leg has given him a place atop UMass' all-time career punting average list, at 40.1 yards per punt.

Juniors Doug White and Jason Cherry will once again split time this year at placekicker. Last season, White went 10-for-11 on field goals and 16-for-17 on extra points. Cherry drilled one field goal and 15 of 19 point afters.

Kevin Quinlan, Jimmie Howard and Omari Howard will return kickoffs while DeShon Hardy and Jeremy Robinson will see the most action returning punts.

The attitude is there.

"I think we're probably better than the '98 team," Robinson said. "We've got a lot of speed on the defensive side of the ball, and offensively, we've got a lot of skilled players. We've obviously lost some talent from last year, but we've got some guys out there that are very athletic."

If the Minutemen can come out of the first six games at .500, things begin to look good. But a four game stretch in the middle – beginning with Marshall and ending with Hofstra (all night games) – is tough. Failure to execute will come at a terrible price. The colors of the underdog this year are maroon and white.

But, with a bit of luck and health, come November, Mr. Robinson will still be walking around with "no pain," as will the Amherst faithful.

Young guns return to fill the nets

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Senior John Lytton will be playing a lot more offense this year in his new central midfielder position.

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Theeeyyy'rrreee Baaaccckkk.

Sounds about right considering nine starters and 12 of the first 15 players on the depth chart are back from last year's 12-6-2 squad. With a deep offense, a physical "D" and a force field in goal, the Minutemen are primed for a run at the Atlantic 10 title.

Forwards

Add one year of experience to the third rated offense in the conference and you will understand why Atlantic 10 keepers are clapping their knees and sweating in their Umbro's.

The league's ninth leading scorer, Jeff Deren (8 goals), is back with a new but very familiar striking partner.

"Deren and [Yuri] Morales will start up top," coach Sam Koch said. "I think we are going to get a lot out of them this year."

Just a year ago opposing defenses were used to that helpless feeling you get when talented midfielder Morales hooks up with Deren for a UMass score. But this year, due to the unfortunate injury to Obie Gravely, Morales and his educated right foot will move to the front line, instantly forming one of the most dangerous striker combo's in the league.

"They have to combine with people," Koch said. "When they do that they will be very difficult to stop."

Gravely's status is uncertain due to a nagging neck problem, so moving Morales up to the frontline is the logical move, due to the junior's excellent ball skills and vision.

"He hasn't practiced yet," Koch said of Gravely. "I don't see him getting back into things for awhile"

The sophomore will certainly be missed as his tall, athletic frame makes him a presence in the air while his speed makes him a threat anywhere on the field. But with two gifted players like Deren and Morales, the UMass frontline can stack up with most in the country.

Midfield

The most important position on the field is the central midfielder. The person who occupies this role must be skilled in ball handling, feeding, one- on-one defense and most of all, communication. So with Morales moving to the frontline, coach Koch has chosen one of his most trustworthy players.

"John Lytton is our best man marker but he is also at center midfield running the show," Koch said. "He's doing a great job. He is focused and he is ready to play."

In one offseason, the senior stalwart went from a forgotten soul on the backline, to the focus of possibly the top offense in the league.

With his fresh role in the midfield Lytton inherits a surfeit of talent and toughness beginning with left side wing Derek Rhodes.

"Rhodes is just solid. He is probably our best all around defensive player," Koch said. "He is a good ball handler as well as a tenacious defender. He is a big part of our defense, midfield wise."

Senior Max Wolf who scored a couple huge goals in 2000 will again look to contribute, as will the much-improved Dan Colwell. The sophomore Massachusetts product has made big strides in practice and will look to break into the starting lineup.

The real question in the midfield is Ptah Myers. The sophomore is supremely talented and he has a near limitless upside, but focus remains a question.

"When [Myers] is playing well and he is focused he should be a starter," Koch said.

Myers showed flashes of brilliance last year in his goal scoring ability and most notably in his playmaking.

"He has excellent speed and he has had a good summer," Koch said. "He came back very fit and his first touch is a lot better."

It appears that Myers is focused on turning heads in the conference and possibly the country. If that focus remains steady then this young man's ability could raise the team to another level.

Defense

The backline will certainly have a new look this year, but early signs show that the 2001 version of the UMass defense will be even more smothering than the prequel.

Minuteman soccer fans may be used to seeing Fred Kinateder's face light up in elation after he fills the net but this year he'll be roaming a new area. The senior has officially taken one for the team by moving to defense due to the depth up front.

"He is probably one of our best defensive players, even when he was playing up front," Koch said. "We needed the help in the back and he wanted to move back with the idea that we had good scoring punch."

The senior's athleticism will be a welcome addition to the "D" especially on corner kicks and crossing balls but coach Koch expects to be aggressive when counter attacking as well.

"He gives us a lot of offensive threat coming out of the back and he can finish," Koch said. "He can hit a twenty-yard bomb as well as any offensive player."

Joining Kinateder in the back is fellow senior Shawn Green. Green is always one of the toughest guys on the field, as few games have passed without him sacrificing his

No need to reload for stocked field hockey

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

It was famed sportswriter Bill Simmons, a.k.a. the Boston Sports Guy, who not long ago invented the Patrick Ewing Theory. This theory holds that when a team loses its marquee performer, like the New York Knicks did with their legendary center, it allows the team's other players to step up and each contribute more, thus making the team less predictable and harder to beat.

As of now, the Massachusetts field hockey team would like all of you to buy into the Patrick Ewing Theory.

But in this instance the talent in question isn't an aging pivot, but instead the team's top goal scorer from last year and a goalie who was quite possibly the best in the nation. When forward Kristen Schmidt (14 goals, tied for first in Atlantic 10) and Zowie Tucker (0.66 goals-against average, best in A-10) traded in their turf shoes for caps and gowns, it left the Minutewomen with seemingly huge holes on both sides of the ball.

Not so, according to two-time A-10 Coach of the Year Patty Shea.

"When you have players of that caliber, you tend to defer to them and expect them to make the big plays," said Shea of Schmidt and Tucker. "Now, instead of one or two players with that ability, we will rely on a lot more weapons coming from a lot of different angles.

"You're always going to have a next high scorer and a next goal keeper. Those two may have set the bar with a great tradition, but we have kids who are confident they can live up to them."

Shea's players have certainly bought into her philosophy. Though there are more underclassmen (12) than upperclassmen (nine) on the UMass roster, the team's veterans seem to agree that this year's group is closer, and collectively more talented, than Shea's first four teams here.

And judging by the fact that each of those groups captured both an A-10 title and an NCAA tournament berth, that could bode well for the Maroon and White's chances of reaching the NCAA semis for the first time in nine seasons.

"The vitality that we have right now, the momentum that we're feeling, is just awesome," said co-captain Kerry Ann Jaggassar, who along with fellow seniors Jill Fantasia and Anke Bruemmer forms the nucleus of the UMass defense.

"People will say that we've gotten weaker," co-captain Fantasia said. "But we're not depending on any single person to carry this team anymore – we're coming together, all 21 of us, and I think it's made us stronger."

That cohesiveness will be much needed once the regular season sparks start flying, as the Minutewomen must face a bevy of field hockey's best in a dozen non-conference games before enduring a revamped A-10 slate.

It's hard to imagine the players not looking forward to their Sept. 9 date with Northeastern, which dealt UMass its first loss last year at Richard F. Garber Field. But then again, there may be other opponents on the Maroon and White's schedule that would provide an even sweeter victory.

"That [Northeastern] game was just a fluke," Fantasia said. "We want UConn!" (For the three people who haven't heard, the Minutewomen beat the then-No. 7 Huskies 2-1 at Garber last Sept. 30. It was UMass's first win over UConn in six years.)

Other key non-conference dates include a Sept. 15 date with perennial power Maryland and an Oct. 6 showdown with equally formidable Syracuse.

The addition of Richmond to the A-10 will mean six conference games instead of the usual five, and will present the Maroon and White with another worthy adversary as well.

"Richmond has always been right in the heart of ACC country, in a real hotbed for hockey," Shea said. "Their addition really raises the bar within our conference and gives us another challenge to overcome."

Another challenge? This from a coach who watched her team surrender one goal – yes, that's one as in uno, a single, less than two, etc. – in five conference games last year (seven if you count the A-10 tourney). How can the Minutewomen possibly get up for opponents whom they outscored by a total of 17-1 the season prior?

Well they'd better, according to Shea. Because there certainly won't be any lack of motivation on the other side of the ball.

"We're the biggest game on each team in our conference's schedule," Shea said. "If they beat UMass, it's like they've won a national championship. So they're all going to come at us with an attitude."

So the biggest question remains: do this year's Minutewomen have the talent remaining to weather that attitude and take the next step toward postseason glory?

Despite losing Schmidt, Tucker and three other starters to graduation, a big piece of UMass's scoring remains intact in Bruemmer (12 goals and a team-high 26 points last year). After spending the spring semester on exchange back in her native Germany, the towering sweeper will once again anchor the Maroon and White's penalty corner attack while providing crucial defensive stops in the middle of the field.

Also expected to pick up the scoring slack for UMass is local favorite Lindsay Abbott (nine goals last year). The Northampton native is looking forward to a new offensive scheme in which it isn't just the forwards who are looked to for goals.

"Now we have all these people – forwards, midfielders – all crashing through and getting shots on goal," Abbott said. "It's no longer just the same two or three people having to

Volleyball hopes youth is served

Post-season in spiking distance

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Just short.

For the seniors on this year's Massachusetts volleyball team, those two words represent the magnitude of the frustration of a team that has found itself on the outside looking in on the four-team Atlantic 10 Tournament.

"I think what this group has seen is that three years ago they were one match away from making it to the tournament, two years ago they were one game away, last year they were two points away so I think they feel that it's their due," head coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We're hosting [the A-10] tournament and we don't want to be spectators at it."

The team added twelve new players in the offseason, made up of nine incoming freshmen and three transfer students.

"We'll probably have at least five of our new people that could be contributing daily for us," Kenny said. "Other than that, there's going to be a little bit of time for the others to train at this pace and this tempo and this level before they're ready to compete."

Those making the switch to UMass are Jitka Stehnova, Renee Sewell and Kristen Banks. Stehnova, who hails from Odolena Voda of the Czech Republic, comes from Charles University and will start at setter for the Minutewomen this season.

A transfer from the University of Canberra in Australia, Sewell garnered numerous honors in her home country. Banks comes to UMass after spending two years at Lynn University, where last year she averaged nearly two digs per game in her 22 matches for the Division II Fighting Knights.

Six letterwinners from last year's squad return in the form of senior co-captains Janeen DeMarte and Lymaric Llovet, as well as fellow seniors Celia Wiste and Lauren Vander Veen. Rounding out the returnees are junior Clare Baxter and sophomore Nitia Small.

"It's really early to tell, but I think with the nucleus of returnees and the four seniors that we have, I think we have some pretty nice leadership and experience on the floor," Kenny said. Llovet turned in a strong offensive performance last year with 3.02 kills and 0.81 blocks per game, good enough for second on the team in each category. DeMarte added a solid 1.41 kills per game last season from the outside.

This year's team has a big void to fill, as senior co-captain Rebecca Hasson and senior setter Jenni Drennan were lost to graduation. Hasson garnered all-conference honors last season after leading the team in kills and blocks in the middle. Drennan finished her career at UMass as the school's all-time leader in assists with 2,594.

"With Jenni being our quarterback, it was huge to lose her just as much as it was to lose Rebecca's physical specimen of being such a great athlete and dominating in the middle for us," Kenny said.

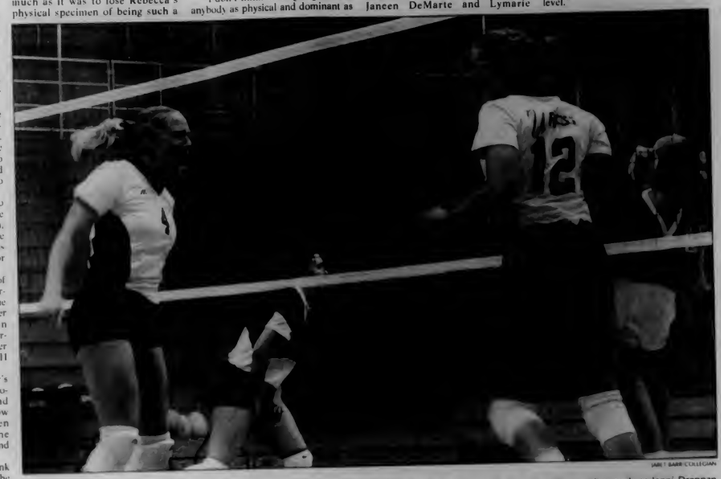
Kenny will look to the combination of Vander Veen, Baxter and Wiste to plug the void in the middle of the court. With her 6-foot-2 frame, Vander Veen averaged just over one kill per game in limited action last year.

"Lauren has the capability – not to be the blocker that Rebecca was – but to add an offensive firepower for us," said Kenny, who has posted a 154-104 record in her nine seasons with UMass.

Baxter averaged over 1.5 kills per game with a strong .216 kill percentage last year, while Wiste showed strongly in the 36 games she appeared in.

"I don't think we're going to have anybody as physical and dominant as Rebecca in the middle, but I'm hoping Nitia [Small] can take over the offensive production that Rebecca gave us," Kenny added.

As a freshman last season, Small did not see much playing time, but posted impressive numbers in her time. She averaged more than one kill and one block per game in her 17 matches, including an impressive nine digs and ten kills against Illinois-Chicago.



As for the defensive side of the ball, the Minutewomen are returning only DeMarte and Llovet among their top five in digs. With that, the Maroon and White will look to its incoming freshman to help set up the experienced frontcourt.

"I think you can look at our left-back defense being very solid with Janeen DeMarte and Lymaric Llovet," Kenny said. "They've been very good this preseason and they're digging balls to target, which is a bonus.

"We probably can depend on two or three [newcomers] that will play primarily defensive specialist roles. I think later on in the year, once the training kicks in with Carol Matos out of Brazil, she'll do very well."

With a colossal influx of talent and a skilled, experienced central core, the Minutewomen will try to find the chemistry that can bring them to the A-10 tournament for the first time since 1996. For Kenny and crew, the task at hand is simple.

"That's their ultimate goal – to be able to play here in November with a chance to win their conference championship and get to the next level."

Wednesday: Today is an off day – not! It's time for a mid week hill sprint up a 200 meter incline set at a 15 degree angle. And just for fun, let's do it nine more times.

Thursday: Back to the weight room but this time we'll take it easy. No, really. You will spend most of your time bench-pressing 150 percent of your body weight. Like freshman quarterback Matt Guice, who weighs in at 207 pounds but benches over 300.

Friday: Let's finish off the week with some invigorating high pulls and dumb bell snatches. Remember, be explosive.

Add that schedule to the 40-hour work week that most of these players put in, then ask yourself if you can handle this regimen. Hey! Wake up, you can't!

UMass has a roster full of finely-tuned athletes who still need the weekend off to recover from the previous five days of hell on earth. Makes you wonder how a beer guzzling, mystery meat eating college student would handle something called the Romanian dead lift or a 15 degree hill sprint.

In the modern age of college athletics, most notably in football, filling a roster with talent is simply not enough anymore. These athletes must develop and exhibit the qualities that coach Otrando is talking about. If they are a step behind in terms of speed, muscle or explosiveness, then they will likely end up below the cut line.

Ask Kevin Quinlan. The diminutive scat back had to spend three years behind a bigger and more explosive Shipp. But now as the premiere runner in coach Mark Whipple's offense, KQ has made a concentrated effort to bulk up and dish out some beatings of his own.

"I needed to put on some more weight, which I tried to focus on," Quinlan said. "I started eating a lot more, taking protein shakes and things of that nature. It puts a little cushion on getting hit and when I lean the shoulder into people I want them to feel me a little more rather than me feeling them."

Quinlan is truly a gifted player with quickness and vision as good as anybody in I-AA football. But at 5-foot-10, 174 pounds he does not look the part of an every down back. So every pound of weight he puts on and every ounce of muscle he adds makes him that much better of a runner and that much more prepared to carry the ball 25-30 times a game.

"I was lot more motivated this summer and I put in a lot of extra work knowing that I am going to be playing a lot more and getting a lot more carries," Quinlan said.

With his senior year on the horizon and a chance to silence all the critics of undersized tailbacks, Kevin Quinlan is motivated.

Ten years ago you could scan the National Football League and the college ranks and you could easily pick out a basic QB body type. Between 6-foot-0 and 6-foot-3 was average and most of that era's signal callers were under 200 pounds with very little muscle. No longer.

The same way Quinlan is under the archetypal average of today's successful backs, newly anointed starter Guice is stronger than the typical college quarterback.

Besides benching over 300 pounds ("high for a quarterback" according to Otrando), the freshman gunslinger also squats 380 and is adroit at escaping the rush and making decisions on the run. Ten years ago he could have been cut for leaving the pocket too early, but in 2001 it is the norm.

Quarterback in college is a strong and athletic position that no longer caters to the weak but skilled. Modern day signal callers must be able to take hits, break tackles and most of all make plays. For that Guice is well equipped. After redshirting in 2000, the freshman could not be more eager to get on the field angered at the futile role he served a year ago.

"I turned that anger [from sitting out a year] into positive energy to run and lift and work hard," Guice said.

Quarterbacks now frequent the weight room instead of avoiding it and for good reason. Building up muscle mass certainly develops offensive production but it also lessens the chance of injury and it can also improve mental toughness and the cerebral points of the game.

As his trial by fire begins, so does an opportunity to turn heads, open eyes and light up scoreboards. Matt Guice is motivated.

So next time you have that thought, think about the six weeks these young men spent in Bob Otrando's underworld. Then maybe you'll listen to your running shoes and gym shorts. Just tell that pillow to keep quiet.

a different starting lineup each game against the Greek national teams.

"[The national teams] were much older, very physical, very smart, and they shot the ball extremely well – typical of what you expect from the Europeans," Lappas said. "We were just playing the games to see what we had."

During the four-game span, Lappas' crew executed mostly a motion offense and a man-to-man defense. The motion offense, however, will be key to Maroon and White success. Under Bruiser, set plays were of the majority. The Lappas offense is little bit freer.

"It's organized freelance, really," Lappas said. "It's an offense where you can do basically what you want but you have certain rules that you have to follow. And I think they enjoyed playing that way. I think it's a player's offense. Yes, it's not totally freelance – there are certain things you have to do in this offense to make it work."

There are certain things you must do to make a basketball team work. And the UMass coaching staff has a firm grasp on things.

So far, so good.

m-soccer

body to block a shot or clear or centering attempt.

Anchoring the defense will be third year Captain and sweeper J.R. Pouncey. The best defender in the A-10 returns to thwart all oncoming attacks and lead his team to the postseason.

"He is as good a leader as there is in the country and he is the best sweeper in the Atlantic 10," Koch said. "He exhibits great leadership on the field, he keeps everybody together, he keeps the team in shape as well as anyone and I can't say enough about him. I just don't have the vocabulary."

Goaltending

The A-10's best goalie is back for his senior tour. You would think that after a year of dominating the conference with gaudy stats (7 shutouts, .91 GAA) and clutch play, Bryan O'Quinn would be satisfied... uh nope.

"He is better now than he was last year, he is a little bit quicker and a little bit stronger," Koch said. "He is as good as any keeper we've had here and I don't know of any better keeper around."

O'Quinn has the ability to dominate and take over a match, a skill that may be required as the A-10 now features three top 40 teams. But as confident as the senior is in himself his coach may be even more confident.

"It's a long season and he has to prove that [he is the best] every week and I am confident that he will," Koch said.

Outlook

With the Minutemen returning most of their key players there are very lofty expectations placed on the program in 2001. But as the Maroon and White have improved so has the conference with Rhode Island and Dayton remaining strong, as nationally recognized Richmond enters the league.

"Richmond is a top 40 team no question, they are right up there with Dayton and Rhode Island," Koch said. "With the NCAA tournament expanding to forty eight teams the Atlantic 10 could send three or four teams to the postseason."

The conference is certainly better equipped to compete on the national stage but so is UMass. With the likes of Deren, Rhodes, Pouncey and O'Quinn returning, coach Koch has his eyes on the postseason... and not losing.

"We expect to win every game."

do all the scoring. That should open up big things for us."

Some of those big things could come from sophomores Iris deHamer (Wenham) and Kristen Ackerbauer (Johnstown, N.Y.) as well as new faces Danielle Carrier (North Attleboro) and Caitlin Beresin (Acton).

The UMass midfield will see a mix of experience and youthful enthusiasm; area products Kaitlyn Byron (Greenfield) and Sarah Bohonowicz (South Deerfield) are the lone upperclassmen amidst a wave of young talent. The team is looking for immediate contributions from all three of these newcomers: Ashley Gilbert (Turner, Maine), Adrianne Monaco (Oxford) and Heather Kenney (Whitehouse Station, N.J.).

Santos," he said. "Those kids can play." They can play so well, in fact, that both Wideberg and Santos were named to the preseason A-10 All-Rookie Team.

The solidified front line helps the team at the midfield position as well. Senior Brooke Bartlett, who was forced to play forward due to injury, will be able to play the midfield. Coach Rudy believes the all-conference player is much more effective at that position.

Bartlett's accolades piled up after the Clifton Park, N.Y. native led the Minutewomen in scoring over the 2000 season. Along with A-10 all-conference honors, Bartlett was named to the United States National B Team, Soccer Buzz Northeast Region All-American Team honors, and Atlantic 10 Fall Academic All-Conference Team among others.

Junior Martha Conover, another member of the all-conference squad, will play alongside Bartlett in the midfield. The Liverpool, N.Y. native has proven a clutch player for the Maroon and White. Three of Conover's five career goals have been game winners. She was also voted Most Improved Player by her teammates last year.

Seniors Kathleen Machamer and Katelyn Jones, junior Kristen Mena, and sophomore Janelle Khouri round out the experienced midfield.

Another preseason A-10 all-conference player, Sarah Cook, will lead the defense into battle. The senior captain started all 19 games as the Minutewomen allowed their opponents to score just 20 goals. The only senior defensive player, Cook will have juniors Alesi Rudd and Maggie LaBrode alongside her, rounding out the upperclassmen on defense.

Sophomore Luttati was the only freshman last year to start in all 19 games, a feat that contributed to her placement on the A-10 All-Rookie team. West Coasters Carly Turman and Brianna Weymouth are two highly touted freshmen ready to join Cook's defensive crew.

Anchoring the UMass defensive effort is a deep goalkeeping crew led by last year's A-10 Defensive Player of the Year, senior Julie Podhrasky. In her first season with UMass, the Dallas, Texas native allowed just 18 goals for a 1.31 goals against average, sixth in the A-10 and recorded a save percentage of just under 80 percent (.795). Podhrasky spent two years at Clemson University before transferring to UMass and saw limited action, appearing in just 17 games for the Tigers.

"The first part of last year was a case of [Julie] shedding rust, particularly her decision making," Rudy said. "Julie has all the tools, technically, athletically, psychologically and in her work ethic and training. She knows the game."

Sophomore Kelly Nigh adds a tremendous amount of depth to the Minutewomen. The Seattle, Wash. native was undefeated at 4-0-1 in eight games as a freshman and posted a miniscule 0.31 goals against average that tied her for second on the UMass single season list.

Coach Rudy has pushed his players harder than usual over the off-season, leading to impressive results. The team worked harder in the weight room, leading to impressive changes on the field.

"We have raised the level of our weight training," Rudy said. "Our players have bought into that weight program. We are seeing a lot of personal records on our three major lifts. We are seeing some nice spin-offs, psychological, and physical dimensions."

Rudy also stressed to his players the importance of coming back to Amherst having worked on polishing their skills. The team didn't let its coach down.

"Our skills have gotten so much better. We put a very high priority on increasing skill level and we have all come back more skillful."

UMass has definite hurdles to climb in 2001, but with honed skills, improved physical fitness, and some luck from the injury fairy, this underdog should surprise many in the A-10 and make its 16th appearance in the NCAA Tournament.

'Reprogramming' Butterfield

News analysis by Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

Early on a bright Sunday morning, Butterfield Dorm is like any other on campus. Parents have lined up along the curb and stand with massive piles of necessities. Blankets and pillows, CD collections, bottled water and everything else sit, cooling in a cool sunlight. Residents are bounding about, introducing themselves tentatively, impatiently wondering when their parents are going to leave. This is all new to them of course.

The only thing separating these students from the ones in Orchard Hill or Sylvan or Southwest is the reason that they stand and wait where they do.

On the night of May 24, and possibly into the morning of May 25, an individual or group of individuals went wild through Butterfield. Bathrooms were destroyed, coaches were destroyed, fire extinguishers were destroyed. To make this easier, Butterfield was destroyed to the tune of a $30,000 dollar bill for damage and subsequent repair. That was after a tumultuous semester for the dorm, including the fall of Thomas Degnan, a student who had attempted to climb onto Butterfield's roof to seize the building's pirate flag. In a response specifically aimed at the vandalism, a group of University of Massachusetts administrators, including Director of Housing Services' Michael Gilbert, 'reprogrammed' the building. 'Reprogram' is a euphemism for creating an entirely new community within a building.

In this case, the entirely new community consists of members of the Commonwealth College and RAP programs, as well as 26 upperclassmen who were given single rooms in the dormitory. However, there are brief shades of the old Butterfield. Three of the building's RAs lived in Butterfield last year. Kara Turner was in England during the spring semester but had been an RA the previous autumn. Troy LoRusso was an RA in the building last year, including at the time of the vandalism. Mathilda Tanner was a resident who had been assigned to Butterfield before the decision was made to fracture the community. In all three cases, University administrators have said that there was no evidence that they were either involved in the vandalism or negligent in their duties as RAs.

With the Butterfield community scattered and the three RAs in Butterfield not talking, confirmation of what happened last year is tough to come by. Few students interviewed for this article seemed to know much about that final explosion of vandalism. Parents knew even less.

Govinda Hancock looks like a Butterfield resident. He has long hair and a scraggly beard, he is absent-mindedly fooling around with things in his room as he talks, he plays Bob Marley on his CD player. Of everybody interviewed for this article, he is the most disappointed in the University's decision to 'reprogram' Butterfield. He is succinct about his frustration at the new building. "I'm upset. Butterfield was a cool, hippie dorm. Hopefully we can keep up the traditions."

But then he adds, having lived in the dorm for only three days at the time of the interview, that most of the new residents aren't, "the Butterfield type." He offers little more explanation.

And what of those traditions?

He is one of the few residents who seem to know concrete facts about Thomas Degnan, the former UMass student who fell off the Butterfield roof attempting to seize the skull and crossbones flag that flew over the building. He also knows about the final night of vandalism, the catalyst for the building's 'reprogramming.' He speaks fondly of a dormitory community that he was never a part of, telling a story of somebody who put a couch out on one of the building's balconies so he'd have somewhere comfortable to smoke. Hancock thinks of that as a harmless, rebellious act.

Govinda Hancock cautiously adds that, when he says the traditions, he means the ones not involving vandalism. It could probably be assumed that he also means ones not involving injured

There was unexpected vandalism under the tallest spire on campus.

Harrassment high on hill

By Jake Ullen
Collegian Staff

Junior Environmental Biology major Angela Paniaccione returned to her room in Van Meter Residence Hall on Tuesday night, only to find that the she had been the victim of an act of vandalism.

Someone had torn her dry-erase board off of the door to her room, and thrown it on the floor of the hallway. The perpetrators had covered the board with anti-drug propaganda, including a sticker depicting a hand holding a joint of marijuana. The sticker read, "Don't let your life go up in smoke," and included the telephone number of a drug abuse support line.

Panaccione perceives that the stickers refer to her status as President of the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition, [CRC], a Registered Student Organization which supports the legalization of marijuana.

In addition to the anti-drug slogans, the word "squelch" was written, along with the phrase, "Don't forget to use your dental dams."

The comment regarding dental dams is apparently a reference to homosexuality, although Panaccione is unsure of what is meant by the use of the word "squelch." The word, according to Miriam-Webster Dictionary, can have three possible meanings - "to fall or stamp on so as to crush," "to completely suppress," and, "to emit a sucking sound."

Panaccione is heterosexual, but feels threatened by the anti-gay language nonetheless.

"I feel as if I've been discriminated against in three different ways - gender, sexual orientation, and [my job with] the CRC," said Panaccione.

"It's not as if I shoved drugs in peoples' faces. I just happen to support legalization," she added. "I come here to go to school, and to get more people involved. School hasn't even started yet, and I'm being attacked."

Panaccione also stated that, in several years of work with the Cannabis Reform Coalition, this was the first time that she had been threatened or discriminated against.

Paul Schmidt, the Resident Assistant [RA] for Panaccione's floor, held a meeting for residents of the Van Meter basement, at which the incident was discussed. Reporters were asked not to attend the meeting. Panaccione states that no one at the meeting claimed to have seen anything unusual.

Schmidt declined to comment on the matter, stating that his superiors in the Housing Office have asked him not to speak to the press regarding the incident.

Undergrad found dead on campus

The body of Elizabeth Hebert, a junior political science major at the University of Massachusetts was discovered on Thursday, June 28, in her room in Crampton Hall.

Residence life staff discovered her death at about 1pm that day.

Joseph Marshall, dean of enrollment services, announced her death on June 29, in a University statement.

The University police were notified and Hebert was pronounced dead at the scene by the medical examiner. There is no evidence of foul play, according to University Police Chief John Luippold Jr.

Luippold said the case remains under investigation by University police and state police attached to the Northwestern District Attorney's Office, in accordance with state laws governing unattended deaths.

Hebert, 19, of Farmington, Connecticut, was attending summer classes at UMass.

Graduate students fight for their rights

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Labor Relations Board last week that found the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) not guilty of encouraging an illegal strike.

The University of Massachusetts had filed a petition with the Board to look at two incidents during the summer involving Continuing Education employees. The first incident, a five hour grade delay, occurred at the end of the first summer session when instructors for continuing education classes withheld final grades and held a protest outside of the Continuing Education building. The second incident, a 'sick-out,' occurred during the second summer session when eight employees for the Continuing Education department called in sick on the same day, an action which the University alleged was a strike.

As a result all eight employees were told that they would not be re-hired and were told that they would not be paid if they did not make up the class that was missed.

"The grades were late as a symbolic action," GEO president James A.W. Shaw explained. "The University claimed that we jeopardized our student's privacy, which we did not."

GEO contested UMass' actions in the Labor Commission, which found that withholding grades for specific duration of time was not illegal because others had turned in late grades previous to this incident with no consequences, therefore turning in grades on time was not specifically required by the University. They also found that GEO did not "induce, encourage or condone a any strike, work stoppage, slowdown or withholding of services by public employees," as Massachusetts State Law specifically states that they are not allowed to do.

Susan Pearson, associate provost and chief negotiator for the University cited "disappointment" as her reaction to the incident. She explained in a statement to the press, "the Commission cited evidence that the union had planned a sick-out and then came to the puzzling conclusion that the one that occurred had not been encouraged or condemned by them." Pearson went on to explain that she felt that the sick-out had negatively affected students within continuing education classes in a harmful way.

According to Shaw the University is continuing to punish the instructors that called in sick by refusing them future employment and docking their pay even though they were not found to be doing anything wrong.

"After the hearing the University took disciplinary action," Shaw explained. "They wanted to intimidate the union workers, in fact we had done nothing wrong, but the University is still threatening disciplinary action."

Many employees of the Division of Continuing Education had been attempting to become part of GEO citing lower wages, lack of health care benefits and a lack of job security as some of the reasons. Much of the protests centered around both contract bargaining difficulties and the University's refusal to allow Continuing Education employees to become part of GEO.

"We are willing to escalate the fight and we are willing to hit hard," Shaw said. "We (Continuing Education) deserve a union."

The Union did however settle their upcoming three-year contract with the University and are moving towards voting on the new document in the upcoming months. The new contract provides for five percent raises to graduate employees over the next three years, an improved dental plan for graduate students and an incentive for AI-ANA recruitment and retention.

"We think that it is a great contract and that the union has been able to make important strides," Shaw explained. "There were important victories within the contract that GEO members should be proud of."

There are plenty of stories going around about Butterfield. One student reported that she'd heard "pirates used to" live in her room. Someone spoke of a resident trying to put the skull and cross-bones on the building and failing. Stories abound about Butterfield being a clear inghouse of available drugs on campus. More and more of the stories are less about what happened last year, but instead about what happened within the past few days. These are new students who are meeting new people by volume. Caring about the history of their dorm is low on the list of immediate priorities.

There are former residents who want the new residents to know about their old dorm. Almost daily, they have been seen in the dormitory. These residents have been in the building instructing the interested in how to sneak kegs into the building (a time-honored tradition, no doubt) and at least one has returned to bemoan the "new" Butterfield. It is, after all, a building without the murals that once adorned the walls, without the dining hall that once fed the building, without the booming music that once echoed from its walls.

But new residents and the building's supervisors want the building to move on. Last Tuesday night, there was a building wide meeting and at the meetings, students were told that they were welcome at the building and that anybody who'd been telling them otherwise was incorrect.

Nicole Brown, a freshman nursing major who is a member of the Commonwealth College, said of her peers that most "sort of" know what happened in the building, not hesitating to add that, "now it's completely different from what they said it was."

There are consistent mentions of "they" and "then" and "how it was." These residents just don't know, or at least anymore than what they've heard through the grapevine. Their parents? They know even less. Many asked more questions of the Daily Collegian than were asked of them.

"We were told she was moved because Baker didn't have enough room for the RAP program," Jennifer Atwood said. Her daughter, Tara Atwood, is a freshman majoring in Arts and Sciences. It seems that most parents were under the impression that Baker, which had previously housed the RAP Impact floor, simply ran out of room. A letter was sent to all students who expected to move into Baker that the dorm was full and the program had to be moved. Students, including Govinda Hancock, reported receiving the same letter. Impact is a RAP floor designed to promote community involvement.

Gilbert said that his department had talked to the directors of the RAP program and the Commonwealth College and offered Butterfield as an alternate site.

"We had a better site for them this year, so we notified them that they'd be moving into that building," Gilbert said, referring to Butterfield. At no point during interviews with Gilbert did he say that that the Baker RAP had been filled to capacity. He later added that the Commonwealth College and RAP programs had been contacted because of their consistent success when it came to programming.

He said that anyone saying that Commonwealth College students were moved into the dorm because of their relative harmlessness was incorrect. He insisted that the students moved into the dorm were there because they were parts of successful programs on campus.

Of course, he also says the following, "hopefully, the new population won't be problematic."

Gilbert goes beyond hope. There is a new video camera on Van Meter, aimed towards Butterfield. Gilbert says he just wants to know who is trying to gain access to the building and to the roof, should anyone try. It is just another deterrent to Gilbert, another "tool" as he says.

Then there are the 26 upperclassmen Corralled during the all-building meeting, the 26 students were told that they were to be "mentors" for the building. There was little clarification about what that role would involve. "Mentors" were to be role-models, but whether or not that involves any actual responsibility is unknown. Strangely, even the choosing of the 26 seems to be marred by a number of different stories. Gilbert claimed that all were supposed to have been members of the Commonwealth College or RAP programs, but at least three have no relationship to either program. No information was available about the other 23. Regardless of the confusion, apathy reigns supreme.

The parents seemed relieved to know that their children would be moving into Honor's dorms. Atwood said she would have "freaked" if she'd known about how the dorm used to be, and said she didn't know about anything that had happened at the dormitory previously. Karen and Dave Bernier agreed that Butterfield had a great location but wanted to know what happened on the final night. Dave Bernier said he remembered seeing something on the evening news – the family is from Holliston – but pressed for more information.

In a strange way, everyone seemed curious about what had happened, like there were friendly ghosts in the building that everyone wanted to meet. Some parents cracked jokes that "at least it isn't Southwest."

On Sunday morning, this is the new Butterfield: a confusing collection of old stories and completely new faces. The only evidence of students who care about the building's past are the ones who want to see old dining hall opened. After a few days in Franklin, a dining hall of their own sounds downright divine to most new residents.

The UMass administrators have said, again and again, that the new residents are doing well and even Sunday morning, some on their first days in the dorm, there is little evidence to believe otherwise. In fact, the only edge in anyone's voice comes when it comes to answering questions for articles like this.

Gilbert sounds like he is grinding his teeth when he says that he traditionally had more problems with the Butterfield community after they'd moved in. It's as if he's waiting for something that Butterfield isn't going to do.

Govinda Hancock says it's unfortunate what happened, but "change happens, and we have to deal." Of course, Govinda didn't have to deal with any change. None of the residents did. They all came after. They only need to adjust.

Duty calls for the UMass fleet of public safety officers.

Public safety stepped up on campus; UMass gets new officers and equipment

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department is facing the new year with some fresh officers and some the latest tools.

The loss of Lieutenant Michael Grabiec in June following a long illness left a hole in both the ranks and hearts of the UMPD.

"It's tough," Chief John Luippold, head of Public Safety said. "We miss him."

Chip Thrasher and Tommy O'Donnell were both promoted to Lieutenant, filling Grabiec's position, and officers Lisa Kidwell and Michael Ross both rose to Sergeant. Brian Kellogg, Matthew Malo and Jessica Van Voorhis were sworn in as officers over the summer.

New officers go through a rigorous hiring and training process, Luippold explained.

"We do a testing process, which creates a list of candidates. First there is a written test, then a physical fitness test with the state police," Luippold said. "Then there is a community interview with officers and community members and recruits, then a medical check to make sure they are in good general health, then a psychological exam."

But a recruit's journey into the ranks of the UMPD is not just testing. After this battery of tests, candidates are selected to enroll in the Municipal and City Police Officer training courses at the Agawam Police Academy.

"There is a probation period of a year, after their training. There are also three Field Training program officers, who do nothing but train recruits," Luippold said. "They show them the ropes, then they move on to the next stage where they can make limited decisions on the street, then there is a third shadow stage, in which the training officer simply observes the officer on the street."

As for new programs and equipment, the campus now has surveillance cameras in one of the outlying parking lots. The University installed four security cameras in the parking lot adjacent to Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The cameras are operational, and have been installed by UMass Parking Services, in collaboration with the Division of Public Safety and the Student Government Association.

The stadium parking lot has spaces for 770 cars. The cameras are positioned on utility poles at the four corners of the lot. Signage will alert users to the electronic surveillance.

"We hope the cameras will serve as a deterrent to acts of vandalism or other unacceptable behaviors," he said.

According to Luippold, the stadium parking lot is an appropriate location for the cameras because the lot is frequently used around-the-clock and mainly by students for long periods of time.

With a large incoming class of freshmen, as well as the returning students, Luippold stresses the importance of pedestrian safety and general crime prevention.

"Pedestrian safety is important. We are working on a pedestrian safety education component on motor vehicle safety. We're borrowing a speed board from the Highway Safety council and setting that up, after educating motorists, we'll begin stopping cars that have violated traffic laws and educating them, and then we'll move into a period of enforcement, where it will be a citation and not just education," Luippold said. "It's really just common sense," he said, adding "Look both ways, use crosswalks, if you are driving be aware that there are a lot of pedestrians, and be courteous to them, it is a violation of state law to fail to yield to a pedestrian."

Common sense also plays into crime prevention as well.

"We get a large number of larceny reports. They need to hang on to their belongings, lock their bikes, not putting stuff down and walking away, because it will walk," Luippold said. "A big part is getting students into the habit of always locking their doors, even if they are just going down the hall to visit a friend. If they see suspicious activity, notify the UMPD as well as the RAs. Walk well-traveled and well-lit areas, and walk with companions. There are 94 help phones on campus; learn where they are and how to use them.

"This campus is a large city. There's 11,000 students in residence, and with the commuters and staff, our daily population swells to over 30,000, and our problems are comparable with any city of our size," Luippold added. "Faculty, staff and students need to be aware of safety in the community. This is a large part of what we can do to make this a safer campus."

Military strikes in Iraq
Coalition aircraft attack

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

United States and Royal Air Force warplanes struck targets in Iraq yesterday as part of an ongoing response to threats in the Southern No Fly Zone.

Coalition aircraft used "precision guided weapons" according to a United States Central Command press release. The RAF has confirmed that their planes used laser-guided bombs.

"RAF and US aircraft have taken defensive action against Iraqi installations which have been directing attacks against humanitarian air patrols in the southern no-fly zone," the RAF News Service stated. "Tornado GR4s used Paveway laser-guided bombs for the operation, supported by an RAF VC10 refueling tanker."

The Department of Defense has not officially confirmed which US planes were used in the attack. The USS Enterprise, with its 85 aircraft, is stationed in the Gulf with the rest of the 5th Fleet, but the RAF News Service credits them as United States Air Force aircraft. The Navy has, as of September 4, 14 ships and approximately 8,220 sailors and Marines stationed in the Arabian Gulf.

"RAF Tornado GR4s based in the Gulf took part in a limited defensive operation against Iraqi air defense sites," the RAF statement continued. "Four targets at 3 locations were attacked by RAF and USAF aircraft."

The Iraqi News Agency claims that this latest attack injured four civilians.

"The warplanes flew over the provinces of Basra, Thiqar, Muthana and Qadissiya. The planes attacked civilian installations in Muthana province, southern Iraq, and caused injury of four civilians. Iraqi missile force and anti-aircraft artillery drove the enemy planes out of national airspace back to their bases in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait," a spokesman for Iraqi Air Defense Command said.

The Coalition forces maintain that the strike was purely military, and was only in retaliation from threats from Iraqi anti-aircraft artillery and surface to air missiles, and strenuously denied that civilians were injured or targeted.

"Coalition strikes in the No-Fly Zones are executed as a self-defense measure in response to Iraqi hostile threats and acts against Coalition forces and their aircraft," Central Command stated. "Coalition aircraft never target civilian populations or infrastructure and go to painstaking lengths to avoid injury to civilians and damage to civilian facilities."

This attack, on anti-aircraft artillery and surface to air missile sites in the southern No-Fly zone marks the latest in a string of sorties against Iraqi military sites.

Coalition Forces struck radar and other military targets in Iraq on August 10, 14 and 25. On August 27, an Air Force unmanned Predator reconnaissance vehicle was reported missing by Central Command. Iraq claimed that it shot the vehicle down.

On August 28, Coalition Forces struck command and control stations in the southern No-Fly Zone. On August 30, Coalition Forces renewed their attacks on military radar sites.

The damage done by this most recent attack on anti aircraft sites is not yet known. Iraqi sources have not mentioned any damage to military targets, and although they claim victory, no Coalition aircraft were reported missing.

Central Command is adamant that they only respond to threats against personnel of aircraft.

"If Iraq were to cease its threatening actions, Coalition strikes would cease as well," Central Command stated. "To date, there have been more than 1,015 separate incidents of Iraqi surface-to-air missile and anti-aircraft artillery fire directed against Coalition aircraft since December 1998, including more than 385 in this calendar year. Iraqi aircraft violated the Southern No-Fly Zone more than 160 times during the same period."

Stem cell research: back to square one?

A report out of Washington D.C. yesterday acknowledged that less than half of the stem cell lines previously approved for federal funding are not, in fact, ready to shift into the hands of researchers. Not just yet, anyways.

The announcement came as a surprise to few, though, as most experts have been questioning the number of developed cell lines since President Bush decided to move ahead with restricted exploration on August 9th of this year.

On that date, Bush announced that there were "more than 60 genetically diverse stem cell lines" in existence, taken from embryos that had already been destroyed, and voiced his support of research that could take the cell lines and discover potentially life-saving therapies and cures.

While not a complete surprise to most, the fact that only some 25 of the 60 reported cell lines are ready to go has helped to further cloud an already hot issue, and the executive decision that set it into motion.

Support for stem cell research has poured in heavily from all sides; those in favor of the possibly endless benefits we could cull from it, and those faced with a moral dilemma, of compromising a form of human life for scientific research. Bush tried to dodge that bullet by announcing all samples would have been destroyed anyways, thus wiping his hands of the life-decision that many people had been focusing on.

From certain perspectives, both sides have legitimate arguments and, often enough, evidence to back their respective claims. However, in the end, it becomes increasingly difficult for the naysayers to argue what was ultimately the deciding factor; the potential here is simply too great to ignore.

Although it remains in a very early infancy, which brings with it the real possibility of failure, stem cell research is a sign of hope for some people, the "next big thing" that we've been waiting for. With the potential to aid a wide array of ailments, such as juvenile diabetes, Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease, the small but real chance of finding cures is motivating factor enough.

Bush also announced that while embryos are the best source for gathering the stem cells, they are far from the only one. By his account, scientists say there is some potential in those cells taken from adult cells, umbilical cords and placentas.

Granted, Bush has made his share of missteps in this decidedly sensitive issue, but his actions, influenced heavily by the people he has surrounded himself with, have generally been taken in an appropriate direction. A potential cure is out there somewhere; his decision, the first of what will ultimately be many, has started us down the road of finding it.

The worst of all sins

GEORGE THOMAS

"That's just your perception, I see things differently." This oft-quoted phrase, with its insinuation that all is based on perception, as if how each of us sees things actually makes them that way, was offered up to me recently by my father-in-law. It was his bit of wisdom to the younger generation, but it was a stunning piece of advice because it smacked, at its core, of the very furnishings of mind of the younger generation that he so often rails against. Here was this stodgy conservative – let's just say that for him William F. Buckley is suspiciously liberal with his rumpled suits, unkempt longish hair, and penchant for big words – speaking the language of subjectivism. This was no idle matter. In dispute was, well, whether or not he was acting like a jerk. But it was not just your garden-variety spat between the generations – the Violent Femmes playing in the background – that has occurred since time immemorial – or at least since the invention of the car. I venture it's far more.

The issue got at the very nature of what it means to be a jerk and, thereby, touched on deep philosophical issues. I'm serious. This debate about the essence of "jerkiness" pushed to the core of whether judgment – in any form – is even possible. Indeed, it hit on the debate of our time, the debate about subjectivism and moral relativism. Much to my astonishment, this 1950's conservative was denying the very possibility of judgment, of reaching, that is, independent conclusions that are not simply subjective. So all of this is a bit silly and pretty amusing, assuming he's not your father-in-law. There is a deeper point here, though, and it's this: just how are we to prod the younger generation beyond subjectivism and teach them that judgment is central to any notion of personal responsibility – that it is foundational to our notion of law and even mundane things like grades – when our conservative elders don't even buy it?

Now, my wife and my mother-in-law were asking, ever so gently, to use his BMW, as the other car was being used by my sister-in-law. It must be said that this small car, which requires you to put your knees in your chin when riding in the back seat, is pitched above all else. Knowing this, my wife suspected that he'd be deeply suspicious of having his car driven by anyone else, including his wife of thirty-plus years, let alone driven to the beach for something as frivolous as relaxation, so she'd asked whether we needed to rent a car. "No, why would you rent a car?" We we're not so naive as to actually fall for this. Instead, seeking not to offend, we took him at his word. And so, when the need arose, my mother-in-law asked the impossible:

"Will your car be available tomorrow?"

"No."

Silence.

"Why not?"

"My car needs to work."

More silence, as we wondered what it meant that his car needed to work (you see, he works at home and so, it turns out, does his car).

Mother-in-law retreated and began again: "You mean you have to use your car tomorrow? When? Could we use it after you run your errands?" Well? We waited.

"Umm, uhhh...no."

Long pause as we looked on. "Uhh, uh, I, I...I don't know when I'm going."

More silence.

"Uhh, uhhh, my car needs to work." Here he attempted a bit of a laugh as if this was all silly and fun.

More silence as we digested what it meant for his car to work, i.e., sit idly in the garage. Finally, irked mother and daughter wanted to know why he was acting like a jerk. The debate over the meaning of "jerk" was joined.

In his defense, he suggested that while we might not understand his behavior, he didn't mean to be a jerk.

"So why can't we use the car?

"Ahhh, [mother-in-law's pet name, withheld to protect the innocent], geez."

"No, [father-in-law's name, withheld to protect me]. You can't just act like this."

"UHHH"

"Why can't we use your car?"

"Because, it needs to work. Haahh," another fake laugh, with a silly smirk.

"Why are you doing this? I just don't see why you are treating your daughter this way when she's come out to see us. She even asked if she needed to rent a car and you said no. Why are you deliberately being a jerk?"

"I'm not, or I don't mean to be. Umph...it's just my car needs to work."

"Why are you doing this?"

"I'm not."

"It seems that way."

"That's just how you see it."

We might see it this way, but he did not; therefore, he was not "acting" any way, least of all like a jerk. He offered no argument, no explanation, but the mere fact of his subjective perception – as if his perception controlled how the outside world could be interpreted. Consider it. My father-in-law's argument, such as it is, rejects the very notion that we can independently arrive at a judgment of his action: there is no objective way to measure his behavior. There is only what each of us happens to see: the world is made based on our subjective perception of it. His actions are subject – just like a text – to an infinite variety of interpretations, all depending upon the interpreter and not the phenomena they happen to be interpreting. We could not say, then, that denying your wife and daughter your car for the day, after you said it'd be available, just so that it can sit in the garage and "work" is, ipso facto, to act like a jerk. There is no independent measure, here, of "jerkiness." If he doesn't believe himself to be acting like a jerk, no matter what his outside actions happen to be, he is not acting like a jerk. This paragon of tradition and absolutism (as in "respect your father, NO MATTER WHAT HE DOES") has digested, somehow, the most radical notion of our times when it comes to his own life.

If my father-in-law is any indication, we've swallowed subjectivism whole and made judgment – in any form – the worst of all sins, as the very notion of judgment requires us to go beyond the merely subjective. Lost in this sloppy thinking is a key distinction between types of judgment. If it's wrong to judge a person because they are, say, Jewish, is it just as wrong to judge a person because they're acting like a jerk? But to judge someone for acting like a jerk is to hold them morally accountable for how they act; it is central to the very notion of personal responsibility, not to mention the entire structure of liberal society. Even such a value as respect for your father cannot escape judgment. Surely such respect is due, in part, based on actions, and so if your father acted like a jerk, you wouldn't be bound to respect him. Otherwise, we'd have to respect our elders no matter what they did or thought, and that'd mean we'd have to respect Ted Kennedy just because he's old. So you see the necessity of judgment, even when it comes to fathers and the uphill battle we must fight when even those fathers who preach personal responsibility reject the possibility of judgment that must accompany it and wallow in subjectivism.

Time to look around

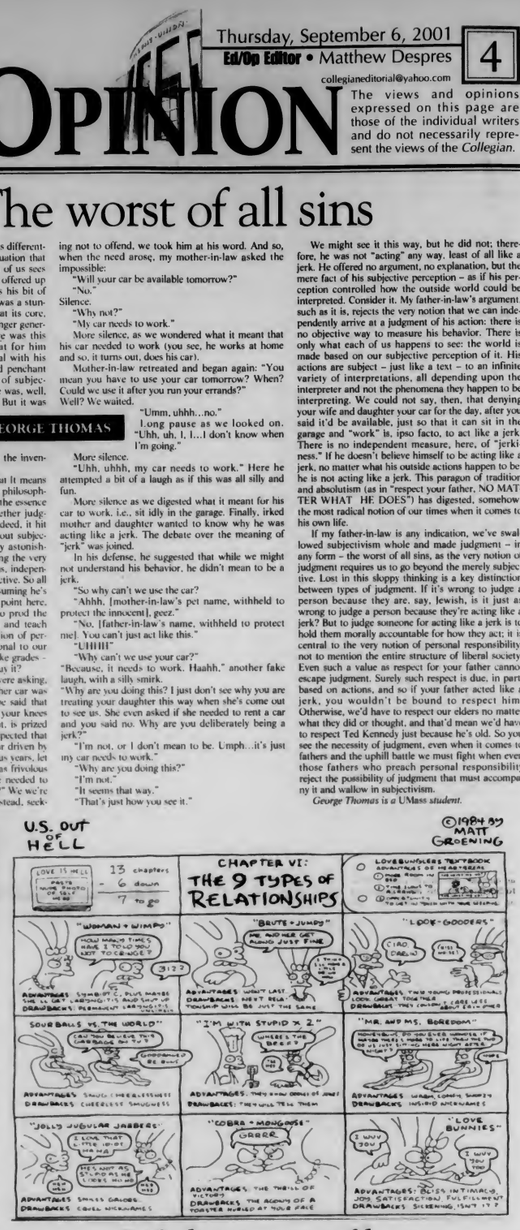
If you're reading my column for the first time, don't let this one fool you. You're in store for a wild ride. Before I can begin that trip, however, it has to start here. In preparation for my first column of the semester, I asked a few of my friends what I should write about and the one consistent I got was from my roommate Winnie, who suggested I write about her. I met Winnie my freshman year and don't know her very well but we decided that moving together was better than being at the mercy of the random lottery. I guess to scare me into submission she mentioned a few things jokingly to make me regret rooming with her.

Winnie is a biochemistry major who has a dead mouse collection which will be kept in the room and has a pet mouse which she keeps to cannibalize after their mouse died a mysterious violent death. Hopefully this surviving mouse won't be coming to school.

But this column isn't about Winnie. Hot and cold adventures will unfold as the semester goes on. Instead I've been thinking about things I haven't done and want to do. As I turned twenty this summer I came to the horrible realization that I am halfway through college. I've been thinking a lot about how far I've come since my first year and how many things I've accomplished or have yet to try. Two more years still seems like a long time but when I look back on how quickly my freshman and sophomore years have gone by, I could help but worry a little bit about the time frame. I have left to be young and reckless. I have way too many thoughts about my time at school but will share a few since I have all my junior year.

This year I hope to go on more driving trips. The world's largest pothole is only half an hour from campus which my friends and I discovered on one of our road trips. One weekend we decided we were going to drive to Vermont and at some point along the way we were trying to find a Bickford's or a truck stop. On the road we saw a sign for a tourist town called Shelburne Falls, which had a Bridge of Flowers, and decided to stop. Shelburne Falls is home to the world's largest pothole, which was made because of prehistoric glaciers that once moved through the area. It's now a set of small waterfalls with rocks that you can climb on and around. It's a beautiful place that I recommend to everyone. And if you're looking for a Bickford's there's one in Brattleboro, Vermont.

UMass is less than an hour from Six Flags and I still haven't gone yet. It's almost a crime! I also want to try the corn maze in Sunderland and go to Bright Nites in Springfield this winter. Researching and going to more performances would be good too. Just by picking up a few calendars reading a few posters in the Concourse and browsing a few websites, you can find lots of interesting stuff to do on the weekends. Last year I saw the Boston Pops and the London City Opera at the FAC.



I'd like to take advantage of the outdoors more as well. Hiking in the fall is beautiful, and the Holyoke Range is PVTA accessible if you make the effort to go. I've been researching area campsites and the possibility of going white water rafting next spring.

Right now, none of my friends are too keen on the idea of rafting but I'm sure I can convince someone to go with me. Aside from the big things, I also look forward to the simpler things, like playing Frisbee behind Orchard Hill, falling asleep reading by the pond and hanging around the dorms. Whether you're a freshman or a senior, remember, the clock is ticking. There isn't a lot of time left, even if you're on the five-year plan. Everything is at your fingertips; it's just a matter of either waking up before noon or putting down that beer can for one night.

Take a few risks, but don't do anything too stupid. Remember how precious the time in one semester is.

Life lessons on film: 'The Kid' has a few

KATIE LANDERS

I've seen The Kid 15 times this summer.

Pop quiz

Katie has seen The Kid 15 times this summer because:

a.) I have no friends and have resorted to watching Disney movies for amusement

b.) Marlboro, Massachusetts is the most boring city in the United States, especially if you're six months shy of 21

c.) Several lessons can be picked up in this G rated flick

d.) Both B and C

If you answered A, then I'm never speaking to you again. Ever.

D is correct, and so I will go on to explain.

Marlboro is very boring. I spent the vast majority of the last three months guarding small children in a five-foot deep pool of an apartment complex, eight hours a day with no bathroom breaks. My friends are all 21, so I spent most nights watching television. The Kid has been run on HBO a million times. Whenever it's on I'll just sit and finish it. I do have friends.

For the last part, response C, the movie is filled with life lessons. Most Disney movies are, animated or real-life.

Your eighth birth year passes, and eventually you turn nine. Inside of everyone is a little eight-year-old who may not always be obvious, but could peek out at any time. Dreams and aspirations at the age of eight are heartfelt and although they may dissipate with age, they could quite possibly be the last of honesty and innocence.

As people grow older, including myself, we sometimes try to be someone we're not. The part of the adult Russ, played by Bruce Willis, works as an Image Consultant in his middle age, all the while dreaming to be a jet pilot as a child.

Masking whom you are to create the image of a better person may work short term, but on the Inside, you will always know who you are. If you mask yourself too long eventually you'll become the adverse of what you aspired: a no one.

Money can only buy you happiness for so long.

A puppy can make you that much cooler, or at least make you a little bit happier.

Eventually, the big slide isn't going to seem so big anymore.

Russ has learned over the course of 40 years to suppress the events that made him who he is. The eight-year-old version of him, Rusty (played by Spencer Breslin) doesn't know what will happen along the course of 38 more years and adult Russ isn't willing to share. The point of the movie is that each event of life, no matter how big or how small, is important.

My brother will be eight this month. If I could I would keep him like this forever, because to me, he is perfect. Although little brothers can bring the usual annoyance, a piece of them is a piece of you that's been repressed or lost. They can help you to remember who you are.

I'm a junior now. Two years ago I was starting a huge part of my life, and now it's that chapter is half over. Instead of going into the second grade I'm going into the fifteenth. I'm no longer worried about whether my teacher is going to be mean and if I'm going to have to sit next to the smelly kid, but if the teacher is going to let me add their class and if I'm going to have to sit next to that smelly kid who decided that showering would kill his natural aura (he never goes away).

I wanted to be a doctor and a great tap dancer when I was eight. I can't say that I forecast performing an appendectomy soon or moving across the stage like Ginger Rogers, but I remember how I felt when that was all I wanted to be. I don't know what I want to be tomorrow anymore, but I know the little Katie inside me will help me along the way.

Rent The Kid. It'll make you think.

Spirits a beautifully hollow tech demo

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

FINAL FANTASY: THE SPIRITS WITHIN
Directed by* Hironobu Sakaguchi and Motonori Sakakibara
Featuring the voices of* Ming Na Wen and Steve Buscemi

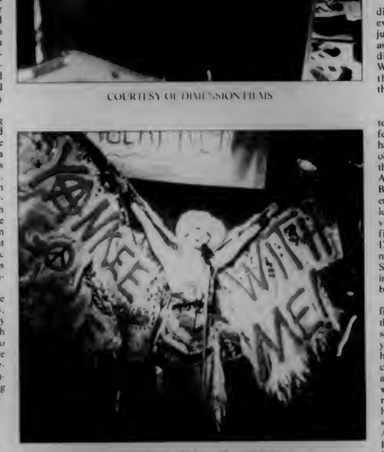
Many gamers complained that the most recent installments (VII, VIII, and IX) of the Final Fantasy video games contained too many cinematic cut scenes and not enough absorbing gameplay. There wasn't the vital interaction that games provide, and it felt like you were just entering prompts for a movie.

Now with the animated film Final Fantasy: The Spirits Within, audiences will be the ones screaming for control; for the something, anything, that would make The Spirits Within more than just a project with immense potential bogged down by meandering and emptiness.

The plot itself is straightforward and intriguing. Civilization now exists in space, since 'spirits' now roam a destroyed earth. Two scientists, Aki and Sid, reckon the earth is a living creature capable of feeling pain, and the way to restore the planet is to bring together eight vital spirits and unite them on the surface. This point of view runs contrary to General Hein, whose bloodlust for the spirits runs high after they killed his family, and who believes firing weapons at the earth is the only way to eradicate the spirits.

Fascinating but unexplored alleyways are abound in the first half of the film, and unfortunately take a back seat to the action of the second half. Sid's radical theory makes him an outsider, and he compares himself to Socrates, but his inner anguish is an untapped source. An emotional dialogue between Aki and former lover Greg on an elevator goes the furthest to convince the viewer that these characters aren't just hollow pixels, but their relationship issues tumble into cliches during the later action scenes.



Gamers familiar with the Final Fantasy games will be disappointed that the film doesn't have some of the aspects that make the storytelling in the games so special. Big (but not ridiculous) surprises, colorful enemies, and a cast of characters worth caring about are all absent, save for Aki, who is truly a sympathetic and affecting heroine. Serious fans can take solace in the little things the film shares with the games, like the general's Seifer-esque demeanor and high-collared leather longcoat, the Sid-Aki connection, and the structures and landscape architecture that are very similar to the look of VII and VIII.

Complaining about the lack of big surprises isn't the rambling of a rabid action fan, since not only does the film have its share of action, but a slower paced, aired-out film in this summer of excess is quite welcome. But nothing happens! Aki and Sid run around on missions trying to find spirits, but along the way we don't learn anything real about them. When the collapse into full-on action happens in the last third of the film, no amount of eye candy can save woefully generic beasts being shot at by bland weapons in battles staged with little imagination.

It goes without saying that the movie looks incredible; the colors, textures, and camerawork (especially in the dream sequences) are worth seeing alone, and will be even more so on the upcoming DVD. How the movie feels is the problem. It's unfortunate that a movie about spirits manages to run its course without finding a soul.

Jay & Silent Bob almost as good as Magnolia

JAY AND SILENT BOB STRIKE BACK
Directed by* Kevin Smith
Starring* Jason Mewes, Kevin Smith, and Shannon Elizabeth

Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back may be the most now movie ever made. Affleck's in rehab, and a gossip vapor, Afroman's "Because I Got High" is a staple on hip-hop and alternative radio. And after a summer of complete crap, we're ready for a movie that skewers the Hollywood floaters that have inhabited the last three months.

When compared with its opening week semi-comedy competition, It's easy to see that Kevin Smith's fifth feature is the only one that really understands the audience. Summer Catch is just the latest shock treatment applied to the corpse of the teen comedy, and you just have to hope that audiences stop encouraging them. Woody Allen's Curse of the Jade Scorpion seems to forget that most people's tolerance for Woody's antics cut short about five years ago. And semi-comedy is far too generous a term for Bubble Boy.

So, needless to say, if you don't see the movie in a theater packed with people who know why it's so funny that one character's screen name is "Magnolia fan," (in reference to Smith's infamous bashing of Paul Thomas Anderson's film on his website) you're missing out. And in this respect, this is definitely the most selfish film Smith has made. Not only do you have to be versed in Clerks, Mallrats, Chasing Amy, and Dogma to get many of the jokes here, you also have to be, like Smith, a rabid movie fan and pop culture freak. Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back is a movie made to amuse Smith, as it's clear that there were very few if any concessions made to give the film some sort of universal, marketable appeal.

Which is exactly what makes it so great. The film may be selfish, but it's also incredibly generous, giving movie huffs the in-joke smorgasbord that's always been secondary in similar films. Smith made a movie for himself knowing there are millions of people who are just like him. He's a lot like Jay and Silent Bob, who in the film take a road trip and break into the Miramax studios in Hollywood to stop production of the film based on their comic book, Bluntman and Chronic. At the end of the movie, the two are mistakenly suited up and on the set, so not knowing the script they just wing it.

A lot of times Jay and Silent Bob Strikes Back feels like Smith is winging it, as if half the film was made up of jokes created from hanging around on the set. But there are few people I'd rather see fool around on a massive budget. If you remember when Smith came to UMass last year, he talked for three hours without having any prepared speeches, and just worked off audience questions and stories from memory. What he thinks is funny or interesting pretty much is, so watching him amuse himself for 90 minutes onscreen is 90 minutes I can't think of a better way to spend.

The movie is hilarious, by the way, and there's no point in me trying to explain why individual jokes or scenes are so funny. Jason Mewes given an extended statement on the clitoris; go from there. Fans of Kevin Smith have watched him and his style slowly infiltrate Hollywood and national culture, and now that he's on the top of the pyramid looking down, he aims to please the fans that helped put him there, not the studios or the critics. Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back is apparently a "thank you" movie from Smith, and many people like myself will definitely be saying thanks right back for a film that feels like it was made specifically for us.

Jeepers delivers horror in all the wrong ways

By Julie Burrell and Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

JEEPERS CREEPERS
Directed by Victor Salva
Starring Gina Phillips and Justin Long
Playing at Cinemark

How do we approach a critique of fine film? How do we deal with the complexities of American cinema?

We don't. We went to see Jeepers Creepers instead.

We are then left with an entirely different set of questions. Why for example and, uh, well, probably why is just about the only question worth asking. Why was the film made? Why did anybody agree to pay for this? Why did we voluntarily sit through the whole film?

We just don't know.

Directed by convicted child molester Victor Salva the pled guilty to five felony counts of video taping himself having sexual relations with a 12-year-old boy), Jeepers Creepers is perhaps the most gud-awful piece of film ever. And a child molester directed it. Before we even attempt to tackle the emotional complexities of this movie, let us both note that Salva was convicted of molesting a young boy and filming it. This isn't even Robert Downey Jr.'s perpetual abuse of heavy narcotics. The first film that gained Salva any notoriety involved him having sexual relations with a 12-year-old boy.

But here comes Hollywood! They figure, hey, it's been a few years since the whole "Salva makes video of himself having sexual relations with a 12-year-old boy" incident, so why not give him a few million dollars and some cast-off teen actors and throw them in a movie together? You know, because when you have a director with a little notoriety coming into his first feature horror film, it can only be a plus. Oh sure, headlines like "Director Made Another Film Before Jeepers Creepers Involving Himself Having Sexual Relations with a 12-Year-Old Boy" aren't necessarily the best headlines, but hey, free press is hard to come by.

So Salva and his team of monkeys lodge themselves in a hotel room and produce a feature length script that takes them only eleven-and-a-half minutes to complete. They then watch Spectravision porn for the rest of the night, because, you know, Salva's into that kind of thing. The script that resulted contains no more than 15 minutes worth of material, which by Salva standards translates into an 85-minute film. Salva takes a look at the script after his monkeys have fallen asleep, dumbs it down a little so it isn't too high-falutin', then goes back to Hollywood and say he has something ready to go.

Thus, Jeepers Creepers.

Salva and the monkeys didn't really think they needed to weigh the movie down with likable characters, so we got Justin Long and Gina Philips as the movie's lead roles, Darryl and Trish. Both are, surprisingly, intelligent and down-to-Earth characters whose tale of woe makes it easy to sympathize with them. Or cheer for their total destruction at the hands of Mr. Jeeper Creeper. It's one or the other and the jury is still out.

Anyway, the brother and sister team, in a loosely constructed situation that has them driving a long way home from college, are in 'random' state and see a big, huge truck. The truck tries to run them off the road. So when the truck passes them and disappears, they forget about it right away, and we hope they try to get the hell out of 'random' state as soon as they can. But what they really do is stop and investigate the situation when they later see the driver of the death-truck dumping bodies down a pipe. Because nothing is smarter than to investigate. Always with the further investigation in these horror movies!

Of course, Darryl falls down the pipe and discovers the evil lair, underneath a "spooky" abandoned church, of the guy seen dumping bodies. The man has been taking the bodies and sticking them onto the walls. And at this point, like any good horror film, there is nudity. And like any horrible, poorly written film directed by a former child-molester, the nudity involves fake looking, waxen corpses nailed to walls.

Some more scary stuff happens, and Darry somehow escapes. This is how you might recap the film for your friends. "Well, then this scary thing happened, and there was sort of some eerie stuff..." because you really don't have any other frame of reference for the film. We were watching, and in the back of our minds, we were thinking, "hey, a child molester was paid to make this film." Meanwhile, Darryl

Hedwig gets vibrant big screen treatment

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

HEDWIG AND THE ANGRY INCH
Written, Directed By, and Starring
John Cameron Mitchell
Playing at Academy of Music

Making an off-Broadway rock musical into a movie is treading on dangerous ground. Recent movie musicals ("Evita," "Moulin Rouge") haven't exactly proved successful or even good. And shows billed as "rock musicals," like RENT, Tommy or Jesus Christ Superstar may be musicals, but they don't rock.

Hedwig and the Angry Inch not only succeeds as a movie - it rocks.

John Cameron Mitchell, writer, director and title star of the film, translated his stage show to the screen with grace. What was once basically a one-man show, has taken on the extra characters and scenery necessary for a film, and hasn't changed all that dramatically in the transition. It is still Hedwig's show. And the biting humor and surprising poignancy remains.

In flashback sequences narrated by Hedwig, she tells the story of her life. Once named Hansel, she grew up as a boy in Communist East Berlin, or the "other side" of the Berlin Wall. The story that follows is full of such splits. Like Germany, Hedwig is split in halves between man and woman. And as we come to find out later, she has been separated from the love of her life, her other half.

An American GI sees Hansel sunbathing, and leaves the youngster a trail of candy that leads down a path of seduction. But, in order to get married to the GI and escape Communist Berlin, Hansel must be a woman. So, a botched sex change operation is performed, leaving the newly monikered Hedwig not as a man, and not quite a woman, but with her "angry inch."

The film's scenes are just as cramped as the trashy, tacky seafood restaurants that the talented Angry Inch is reduced to touring, and the tiny hotel rooms that all of the band members squeeze into for sleep. They are touring nationally, following teen Goth rock sensation Tommy Gnosis, who was once the awkward teen geek Tommy Speck. In more flashbacks, Hedwig meets him and falls in love with him. She transforms him from a Jesus freak with little knowledge of music into a dark rocker with real talent.

Tommy achieves stardom by playing Hedwig's songs, and leaves her in the shadows. She is reduced to claiming her fame in tabloids, and having a marginal cult following of a few geeky youths.

Jaded contemporary audiences seem to distrust the merit of traditional musicals. The musical aspect works here because, while still doing a superb job narrating her life, Hedwig doesn't bust out in song just anywhere. She's a performer. A glam, David Bowie-like rock star who sings on stage. Or rather, sings next to the salad bar. But she certainly isn't skipping along Austrian hills filling them with the sound of music.

Hedwig is a tough movie. It doesn't shy away from honesty. It balances its love story perfectly between the humor and the music. It's not sappy and it's not sentimental.

Hedwig's faith in love, bruised though it is, keeps her going. The story of love, told to her as a youngster by her mother, is recounted in the song "The Origin of Love." Taken from a speech in Plato's "Symposium," and combined with other world mythologies, this tale accounts for all love, indiscriminate of gender.

The movie doesn't end in a neatly wrapped love story. The connection between Hedwig and her other half is damaged, but it can never be severed. And when love is diminished, it is the music that remains.

STP, BRMC rock slightly, Meshuggah misfires

STONE TEMPLE PILOTS
Shangri-LA DEE DA
Atlantic

STP always talk big in their interviews about how they're the last bastion of 'real rock 'n roll' in the world, standing up against the tides of pop and rap and Lord knows what else, but the fact is that they haven't had a really good rock record since their debut Core in 1992. Since then, in between intervals of self-destruction and laughable side projects, they've managed to record a couple of atrocious pop songs (remember "Big Bang Baby," anyone?) and some alt-metal posing with their last record, No. 4. At long last, however, with Shangri-LA DEE DA the Pilots finally take a step back to their popular-but-not-pop roots with a release that actually does justice to the title of rock 'n roll.

The singles "Days of the Week" and "Hollywood Bitch" are certainly radio-friendly, but they've also got some good, non-foolish lyrics and guitars that are up to the task. Unlike some other STP singles over the years, there's the possibility that they weren't recorded with radio specifically in mind, and that's always a blessing.

The heavier songs are present and accounted for as well. Leadoff hitter "Dumb Love" is fast, short and mean, while "Coma" sounds like Six Feet Under due to its position in between the singles. "Black Again" is a slow tune but manages to avoid 'ballad' classification, a line that the band skirts on more than one occasion but generally manages to avoid.

Perhaps the biggest surprise of the album is that, what with Scott Weiland's eternally publicized drug battles, it isn't an album of heroin struggling, but of woman struggling. Evidently these guys haven't had it easy in their love lives either tactual lyric: "It just kills me because it can't be erased – we're married" from "Hello it's Late") and that's what they chose to write about rather than the expected odes to tapping the vein.

While it's unfortunate that Stone Temple Pilots will probably continue referring to Shangri-LA DEE DA as the "only" rock record of the year, at least they can rest assured that it is actually a rock record, and not a bad one at that. (Rob Schulze)

TOMB RAIDER
Soundtrack
Elektra

Lazy writers like me love it when there are some easy comparisons just ready to be thrown into a piece. Look, here's one now. Tomb Raider the movie looks real pretty, but in essence is just disjointed and empty. Similarly, the soundtrack's promising line-up of hip electronic music acts looks good on paper, but doesn't always deliver. Too easy.

Really though, the Tomb Raider soundtrack is among the better soundtracks available in recent memory, and reminds you that soundtracks can have a consistent theme rather than being samplers of current radio hits. The theme here is white-knuckle electronica, with the occasional rock or rap song for good measure. The main problem here is restraint, as 15 tracks and 70 minutes is a bit meandering for those who like things a little more straightforward and for an album without the luxury of pacing that must settle for 15 different artists surging in different directions.

It must be said that many of the small disappointments on the album are the result of high expectations. The Nine Inch Nails track "Deep" has Trent Reznor recovering, thankfully, from The Fragile sessions, but it's a long hard road, and the track feels like a work in progress. The Nelly Furtado-added remix of Missy Elliott's "Get Ur Freak On" is a playful affair, like two girls in the ball pit of Timbaland's beats, but there's no reason to choose it over the original. And similar to his contribution on the Rarewerks album, Fatboy Slim's "Illuminati" has an awesome mid-section surrounded by blah, while The Chemical Brothers "Galaxy Bounce" has a great groove that for some reason sounds subdued.

Basement Jaxx and OutKast can simply do no wrong, however, and their contributions are the shimmering highlights. "Where's Your Head At?" is silliness at its finest and most brilliant, while "Speedballin'" resists that crazy rush you felt the first time you heard "B.O.B." Throw in an unexpected treat from Delerium and you have every reason to save the money you would have spent on the movie ticket and pick this up instead (if it's not too late). (Michael Delano)

The Fallout

SHADES APART
Sonic Boom
Republic/Universal Records

Pop-rock music is a funny thing.

It seems that the formula is so simple as to be laughable – you get someone with an agreeable singing voice, write some catchy choruses about either loving or hating a certain girl, and throw in some medium-heavy guitar stuff to show that you aren't a total wuss. Keep the songs under four minutes and there you have it – a billion-selling album that everyone will at least kinda like.

It isn't that simple, however. Take the new releases from two very definitely pop-rock bands, Default and Shades Apart, for instance: both follow the formula, and the former puts out a good album while the other drops an instantly forgettable mess. What gives?

Simply put, Default sound like they mean it. A bunch of Canadians putting out their debut record on a minor label, they've got a lot to prove and a lot to lose, and they know it. If they drop crap they probably won't be releasing a second album on any label at all. As such, their songs are heartfelt and real throughout, a legitimate contender in the radio-rock sweepstakes. With a darker view than most bands in this genre and the ability to blend into the mold while keeping a bit distinct, The Fallout should do fairly well for itself.

As for Shades Apart... allow me to tell you a little story, if you will. On my lunch break at my summer job last month I watched a rerun of Saturday Night Live where Soul Asylum was the musical guest. It was hilarious to think that they could ever have been popular; looking back from a safe distance it is obvious just how bland, uninspired, and simply generic Soul Asylum really was. They just caught a trend and let it sweep them up, and when the wave fell, so did they. (I think Dave Pirner asked me for a dollar outside Mystery Train last weekend.)

So it goes with Shades Apart. Different only because of its total mediocrity, Sonic Boom is the sort of album that those who buy it will be hiding from their friends in three years. Even the riffs sound bored, like they'd rather be back in the bargain bin with Candlebox. The formula doesn't work if you don't bring something else to it, and nice hair and ripped jeans don't count. (Rob Schulze)

DAVE NAVARRO
Trust No One
Capitol

OK, so we all know that Dave Navarro can play guitar and look dead sexy in eyeliner. But can he carry an entire album?

The biggest surprise of Trust No One actually isn't that Navarro can actually sing and write lyrics to go with his riffs, but just how gentle and vulnerable the result is.

After all, One Hot Minute, the only album he recorded with the Red Hot Chili Peppers, was easily the most rock album of that band's career, and, despite the posthumous legend that's grown up, Jane's Addiction was pretty much 80's metal. Good 80's metal, no doubt, but 80's metal nonetheless.

In contrast, Trust No One is almost delicate in its slow tempos, acoustic guitars, and haunting, soulbaring lyrics. Navarro's voice, low and clean, aches its way through lyrics of heartbreak, addiction, and hopelessness. Even guest musicians like Roy Mayorga (formerly of the thrash metal band Soulfly) don't speed up the process, following Navarro's lead in slowly exploring pain, rather then just screaming it out.

Navarro recently came out of a life crisis involving (surprise!) heroin and sex, and this and his new book Don't Try This At Home are the results. The heartbreak of addiction and love ooze through Trust No One to the point almost of overkill. It's really hard to feel bad for rich and famous guitar players who self-destruct because they have everything but can't deal with it; it's a compliment to Navarro that despite the Behind the Music material enclosed in his album he never alienates a listener of lesser means. Heartbreak, after all, is universal.

Navarro also clearly approached this album more as a singer/songwriter than as a guitarist. Though he plays on every track, there are few solos to 10,000 Hz. Legend confused second effort from France's Air

Air releases a shaky second album with 10,000 Hz. Legend.

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

AIR
10,000 Hz. Legend
Astralwerks

Music critics spent the early part of summer 2001 scratching their heads over the new Air album, woefully unable to extract any easy answers or quickly bang out the definitive review. Most seemed to simply give up, concluding that the album wasn't that great, but leaving a sort of 'to be continued' imprint on their words. As if to say 'you couldn't pay me enough to listen to this album again, but if someone else says it's genius, I'll give it another spin and agree using some dense philosophical jargon.'

Sorry, this isn't the review that reveals 10,000 Hz. Legend as an unrecognized masterpiece. Because it's not. It's a very confused album from two very talented Frenchmen, Nicolas Godin and Jean-Benoît Dunckel. 10,000 Hz. Legend is the boy who never gets any attention from his parents, so he puts on some lipstick and starts wearing dresses to school. Following this, he receives no shortage of attention, but likely not the intended kind.

10,000 Hz. Legend demands attention, but with an unappealing pout and stomp. Whereas Daft Punk and Basement Jaxx (and formerly Air) know how to incorporate electronic voices and subtle humor, Air's latest pushes those aspects firmly past the point of overkill. Daft Punk's "Digital Love" has a silly digital voice crooning sappy love lines, but it sounds so good and is so endearing and void of (nearly) all pretension that you can't help but go along for the ride.

Meanwhile, "Electronic Performers" and "How Does It Make You Feel," the first two tracks from 10,000 Hz. Legend, focus solely on the silliness and leave out the good music end. The first is a deliberately pompous electronic voice deadpanning a grand introduction, while the second seems to say 'if you thought that was funny, you'll love this!'

But there's nothing to love. Both are tedious and foreshadow similar tracks like "Wonder Milky Bitch" and "People In The City." Even when, after repeated spins, the affecting melancholy and melody of the Air of old starts creeping out in "Don't Be Light" and "Lucky & Unhappy," it can't come close to saving this sinking ship.

Air gets their rocks off with the 'humor,' but leaves the listener out in the cold searching for something worth listening to. Generic drum loops and droning synths don't cut it from the group that created the blissful atmosphere of 1998's breakthrough Moon Safari. And the metaphor about the kid who nobody pays attention to becomes especially confusing when you think 'wait, how can this album be a reaction to not getting any attention when Moon Safari was the recipient of insane critical praise and fan adoration?'

Apparently, the praise for Moon Safari was not entirely in line with the duo's view of the album, as Air has expressed disappointment that many of the songs they felt very serious about on that album were wrongly referred to as 'kitsch.' Likewise, Dunckel told the Boston Phoenix that they wanted to distance themselves from their "easy-listening/in the background" image and create something "more aggressive."

Aggressive is certainly a kind adjective; annoying is more apt for the majority of the material on 10,000 Hz. Legend. I for one never thought Air's whole heart wasn't into the material on Moon Safari, and I only played the album "in the background" after I had listened to it so many times that its silky curves and nuances became as welcome a part of the room as the paintings on the wall.

10,000 Hz. Legend is a painting that reaches out and chokes you as you walk by. And really, good for them. Air has every right to follow a relaxing record with one that has some edge and demands attention. They have my respect for trying something truly different and not just giving us more of the same. But cutting off one's roots is no way to grow. The sweet sounds of Moon Safari can certainly be harnessed to work with a new, more "aggressive" sound if that is Air's new course, rather than viewed as a poison from the past that can only corrupt. As of now, the only corruptive force in Air's music is their stubborn defiance, a stance that in spite of its admirable qualities seems to be sucking the magic right out of them.

Winners and Losers of Summer 2001 entertainment world

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

School was out, but serious students of pop culture (i.e. Collegian entertainment reporters) had no excuse for slacking off. Not when scores of blockbuster movies and huge albums dropped like bombs in Pearl Harbor. Read below to see what flew and what downright blew.

WINNERS

American Pie 2 - And one time at the box office... the sequel to American Pie opened with $45.1 million making it the biggest opening for an R-rated comedy. Hungry for thirds?

The Fast and the Furious - The racecar flick revved up over $40 million and helped kick-start Vin Diesel's acting career. A sequel is already in the wor...er, dealership.

Shrek - Color him happy! Shrek turned out to be a green machine raking in over $260 making it the biggest movie of the summer.

Alicia Keys - Propelled to stardom with her hit gospel single "Fallin'," the soul-songstress' Songs in a Minor debuted at number 1 on the Billboard 200 and hasn't fallen out of the top 10 since.

Destiny's Child - Survivor sold an impressive 3 million units (and counting), earned critical acclaim, and churned out two summer no. 1 hits, "Survivor" and "Bootylicious." With that success, Destiny's Child became the Independent Women of summer.

Madonna - Music makes the people come together indeed. The Material Mom's sold-out Drowned World Tour 2001 became the must-see concert event of the year. Her first tour in eight years mesmerized audiences and critics around the globe. And the Queen of Pop reportedly generated $50 million in US ticket sales alone.

Whitney Houston - Arista Records will pay her $100 million, plus bonuses, for six new albums and two hits compilations. Her first single will be "Greatest Money of All."

SPLIT DECISION

Teen Pop - Critics have been waiting for this opportunity for years: proclaiming teen pop over. With slumping record sales (Mandy Moore, Jessica Simpson, even—insert ear-piercing scream here—the Backstreet Boys) teen pop may go bust any minute. However, 'N Sync (read below) still hold relatively strong numbers and anticipation for Britney's third album, over two months away, is particularly high.

'N Sync - Celebrity sold 1.88 million units it's first week out, entering the books as the second-best opening week figure in SoundScan's history. But their previous effort, No Strings Attached, sold 2.4 million upon entry last year. Does this signal a wilting teen pop fan base or does it mean 'N Sync actually have legs?

LOSERS

Angelina Jolie - Lara Croft: Tomb Raider under-performed and Original Sin, co-starring Antonio Banderas, entered the tomb with less than $20 million.

A.I. - With a box office gross of $76.7 million, the $90 million fairy tale about a robot starring Haley Joel Osment, rusted faster than you can say "I see a dead movie."

Freddy Got Fingered - With a paltry $15.7 million gross, Freddy (and star Tom Green) got more than fingered at the box office. Hey, it's never too late to move back in with the rents.

Scary Movie 2 - The sequel to last summer's lampoon flick scared up only $70 million. Anyone care to ask the Wayans brothers who the real idiots are now?

Pearl Harbor - A $194.6 million box office take ain't bad, but considering the World War II epic cost $135 million and analysts predicted a box office take of $300 million, Harbor bombed.

New York hardcore vets Vision of Disorder choose to no longer follow their own imprint

VOD forges ahead

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

VISION OF DISORDER
From Bliss to Devastation
TVT

From Bliss to Devastation is the realization of everything that the VOD of the past threatened to become. Their sound, pretty consistent from their eponymous debut through the blistering Imprint and early work round up For the Bleeders, always felt constrained by the hardcore rules by which they lived. Namely: scream, don't sing; keep the songs quick and dirty; and god help you if we hear a solo in there. VOD seemed to be chipping away at the old order on Imprint; riff/time changes that would impress Meshuggah, a six-minute song that didn't feel indulgent, and Tim William's beautiful, wounded voice shining through the darkness of the music and subject matter.

Well, on From Bliss... the New York crew have fully shrugged off the hardcore shackles, for better or worse. They make no apologies either, as 'Regurgitate' is a seething indictment of the stale hardcore scene: 'Regurgitate – suck up the shit/ Cause it's the only way you'll get in/ Living life on your knees/ It's the only way you'll please."

The new album finds Williams using his singing voice primarily, with occasional screams, and the band for the most part avoiding the relentless aggression of their past material for a more relaxed verse-chorus-verse structure. A big portion of fans will no doubt turn their back immediately or cry 'sell-out,' and in fact Lorne Behman of CMJ New Music Monthly magazine has stated that the new VOD "could easily hit on hard-rock radio between Godsmack and Creed."

This is hardly the case. VOD may have moved away from hardcore and closer to metal, but their sound is much more distinct and creative than the aforementioned blands, and it's clear from From Bliss...'s dark and fuzzed out atmosphere that they clearly don't have a guiding commercial muse.

Certainly the more accessible sound of the new album springs from their time together as a band and the lessons learned (known as the reverse-Radiohead process). But sell-out or not, From Bliss... is not a very compelling listen.

Things peak on track one. The excellent "Living to Die" has a title like a mission statement, albeit for a mission unfulfilled on the forthcoming 12 tracks. But enjoy it while it lasts, and what's not to enjoy in the spite-filled lyrics, killer riff, and William's attack on a 'couch burning mother fucker?'

On paper, the rest of the album has promise. The band explores the long days and gray skies of the working class on "Southbound," which also contains another of the album's dominant themes: the search for personal worth and purpose. The lyrics use a lot of external metaphors to describe loneliness and confusion, and they're often written with imagery and prose that many bands can only dream of.

But what looks good on the page doesn't necessarily sound good, as the majority of the album proves. Their new de-fanged sound is not a bad thing (it was bound to happen), but putting all the music scene crap aside for a second, VOD just doesn't sound as good and the songs aren't as memorable as they were. Like many other bands recently, it's nice to see VOD following their hearts and not letting outside pressures influence their sound (the end of the title track is downright trippy). But like all chances, it comes with a cost, and From Bliss... just doesn't have the spark of its predecessors.

be found, and none of the technical hard-rock wizardry he displayed with the Peppers. More patient rhythm guitarist than Lead Guitar God, he places the focus firmly on his lyrics (all of which he wrote by himself) where one can't help but feel that it belongs.

Freed from bands to be his own musician, Dave Navarro succeeds. Surprising and gentle, Trust No One gives him his own voice, one that should have been heard long ago. (Rob Schulze)

B.R.M.C.
Black Rebel Motorcycle Club
Virgin

B.R.M.C. are a band that loves to float in distortion and sheer loudness. Their sound is like someone took Idlewild and a i r e d them out and threwtheminquicksand. Hooks and vocal harmonies are there, and they're strong, but they're kicked into submission and uttered with all the precision of Charlie Brown's mom. As a result, their debut is a great rock record obscured (defined?) by a cloud of smoke that some will cherish and others will wish they could blow away.

The album doesn't drop you directly into the sludge: it doesn't open with the wah-wahs of "Awake" or "White Palms". They take it easy on you with "Love Burns," a song whose simplicity makes it even more endearing, and with a chorus that just won't let go ("now she's gone and love burns inside me"). Stuff this catchy shines through any kind of audio sabotage.

The rest of the disc feels meandering and bloated. There are only eleven tracks on display, but I couldn't make it through more than a handful without nodding off. Songs that are either long or feel ten times longer than they are come complete with droning vocals that certainly solidify B.R.M.C.'s cool, unaffected image, but don't cause any sparks. Needless to say, these guys aren't the ones I want asking the rhetorical question "whatever happened to my rock 'n' roll?" as if they are the ones who are here to revive. Rock's not dead, but it's getting more and more pretentious.

I've been a pretty big sucker this summer for the hype machine, having picked up Sigur Ros, The Strokes, The White Stripes, and the Noel Gallagher-approved B.R.M.C. The Strokes and the Stripes are truly brilliant, but the other two are apparently too hip for a metalhead like me. I do love "Rifles" off the disc, though, and for those five minutes, the Rebels seem to really be onto something with their sharp dark sounds. (Michael and Trish continue on their way down the empty highway. They pull off at a diner to get help, where, inexplicably, they are ignored by creepy townsfolk, no doubt because they are stars of a film called Jeepers Creepers directed by, you guessed it, a convicted child-molester.

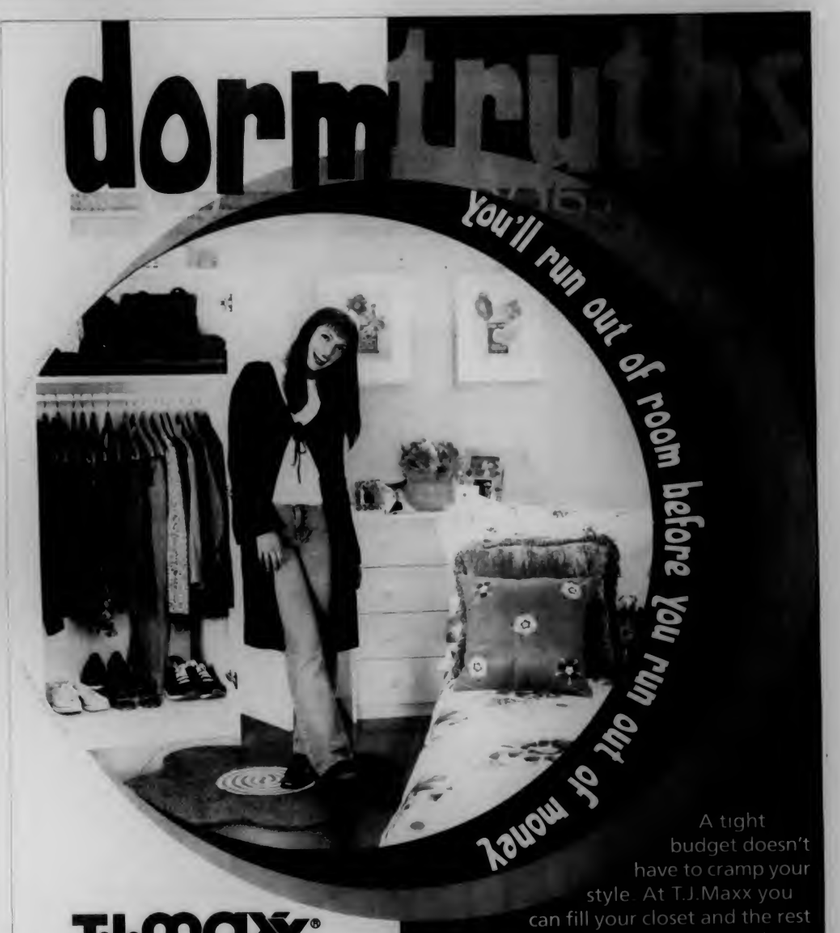
Here's where the "plot" gets muddled. They get a phone call at the diner by a woman who somehow knows their name and that death-truck has been tailing them. Then, in one of the movie's more absurd gimmicks, she tells them to beware the song "Jeepers Creepers." Why? Because it's the name of the film...the monkeys who helped on the script tried to convince Salva to do something else, but he was insistent.

Brother and sister finally convince some police officers to follow behind them down the highway, and not surprisingly, Creeper brutalizes the officers. Oh, and the song finally debuts in the movie.

Sigh.



Salva, despite the numerous strikes against him (child-molestation charges being right at the top of the list), has to-this-point created a film that has a gossamer fine level of suspense. In true fashion, Salva kills it. He shows the Creeper.

Darryl looks like a weakling. He's maybe five foot eight, he weighs 120 pounds soaking wet, he's ridiculously thin and he has a rose tattoo around his belly-button. Not exactly a tough guy. So when the Creeper finally seizes him, we're suddenly left to acknowledge the fact that the Creeper is maybe two inches taller than him and not much bigger. He's also a creepy alien like thing. And...uh...there isn't much more to it.

The final climactic scene is totally destroyed by the sudden realization that, unlike a good movie monster, you'd probably stand a good chance against the Jeeper Creeper in a straight up fight. Darryl, of course, doesn't fare as well, but I won't ruin the ending.

Except to say that it is as disappointing as the rest of the movie and you're left right back where you started: why? Why did Salva choose to end the film that way? Why did Salva choose to end the film that way? Why did Salva choose to end the film that way?

Jeepers Creepers indeed, if anyone has those peepers, we'd suggest watching anything else.

Leigh, Cumming, Reilly reveal Hollywood brats in Party

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

It's hard to get absorbed in a movie in which all of the characters are unlikable, narcissistic and whiny. But, The Anniversary Party succeeds where others might have failed thanks to its voyeuristic charm and its eclectic cast.

The movie was scripted and directed by its stars, Alan Cumming and Jennifer Jason Leigh, whose Hollywood connections have earned them a star-studded cast.

The setting is an intimate gathering of friends at a party for Sally, an actress past her prime (Leigh) and Joe, a novelist and emerging director (Cumming). The audience gets a backstage pass to the private life of movie stars at Joe and Sally's house.

To our satisfaction, all of them turn out to be oversized brats.

The celebration is for Joe and Sally's anniversary party. They've just gotten back together after a year-long separation. If this party lacks in numbers, it certainly makes up for it with some classic carousing: drink, drugs, and sex. And true to the tabloids, all of these vices seem old hat to the guests.

The party really begins when ecstasy is given as a party favor. And in surprisingly believable scenes, the actors display some raw, drug-induced emotion. Joe and Sally's relationship, though outwardly great, seems to be crumbling at the foundation. Their super confident movie star friends are shown to be paranoid and childish.

Sure the story is good, but the characters are the really interesting parts. And so much of the fun in Party lies in the arrivals of the various characters. After all, you probably know who the stars are before seeing it. But, like seeing your friends arriving at a costume party, you're thrilled to see a star arriving as someone else, particularly if this someone else is mean or stupid or scandalous. For instance, Gwyneth Paltrow plays Skye, the spoiled, naïve ingenue. She got the role Sally wanted in Joe's new movie. This endears the young actress to Joe and makes Sally desperately jealous.

Real-life husband and wife Kevin Kline and Phoebe Cates are a loving couple with fabulous parenting skills. They are the voices of reason for their more neurotic and self-absorbed famous friends. You can imagine this is what they're like off-screen. Parker Posey shows up as a somewhat geeky and insecure companion to her husband, an accountant-to-the-stars. But Posey is, as always, fun to watch. John C. Reilly makes an appearance as a powerful director on shaky emotional footing, trying to hold his latest movie and his family together.

There is a strange sub-plot added into the mix when the neighbors, who have been complaining and threatening legal action concerning Sally and Joe's loud and forever-escaping dog, are invited to the party. The dialogues between the two households are awkward, and there's a sense that they were just added simply to create tension. They aren't too much fun to watch. They're not stars, so there's not much of a point to their characters.

Ok, so none of us are friends with movie stars. But, we can at least imagine that the movie is authentic. At times it seems as if Cumming and Leigh were writing an expose and not a script. The relationships between the stars are comfortable and full of chemistry, and there's plenty of the fun feeling that you're somewhere you're not supposed to be.

When all is said and done, this movie is not a profound character examination. Of course, Sally and Joe get into serious arguments. There are trying times. But these people are the rich and famous, which makes it difficult to sympathize with or relate to them. It's best to just sit back, relax, and have a good time at the party. Let the energetic camera work, which bounces from room to room, inside and out, do your moving and thinking for you. You're a fly on the wall, a hidden camera, and you're getting the inside gossip that the tabloids only wish they had. Don't feel guilty, just have fun.

Blender an uninspired music mag

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

As vapid and dumb as Maxim magazine can be, one thing it has always had is a good layout. So it was with hopes of a pretty but vacant rag that I shelled out a reasonable 5 bucks for Maxim's monthly music-focused offshoot, Blender. What I found was a magazine that doesn't take any chances, but does its thing pretty well.

First off, Blender isn't going to win over anyone looking for serious music critique or journalism, that's just not its game. Thankfully, they know this, so their approach is suitably light-hearted throughout, never really producing any writing worthy of true admiration, but rather an extremely broad and all encompassing look at the current music scene, with a good amount of respect and space for music history. How else can you explain a mag that devotes more space to a picture (complete with caption) of current buzz band The Strokes than to Joey Ramone's obituary?

Blender's take on music plays it pretty safe, adhering to a pretty basic news, articles, reviews format, in that order. The news doesn't dig too deep; quick hits about everyone from Elvis to ODB are usually told in cute little trivia-worthy tidbits. These little blurbs certainly aren't missing from other music mags, except that the others usually supplement them with longer pieces about Napster or some such important music issue.

The articles in the premiere issue (the basis for this article) range from workmanlike (the Tim McGraw and Destiny's Child pieces) to damn good (Janet Jackson's cover story) to don't bother (Music and Sports). The reviews are in the current order of 100 words, and plenty of them. They probably number what Rolling Stone covers in two issues, but also have an extensive re-issue section, an in-depth artist discography focus (Prince in this issue), and some live reviews. Come to think of it, their reviews approach is pretty much identical to most other music mags, save for the more extensive re-issue coverage (which is done in most UK mags) and the single artist focus (definitely a highlight).

The reviews don't have nearly the insight of Rolling Stone or Spin, or the passion of Punk Planet or a zine, but are professional and cover the usual spectrum of 'cool' mainstream music, with the token metal and country albums thrown in to appear diverse. They stretch themselves way too thin, though, when they also try to cover film, books, video games, audio equipment, and comics. Except for the books, their coverage of everything else is completely useless, and almost condescending and insulting in its brevity and carelessness.

Blender does manage to teach the tired old music magazine some cool new tricks. The reader's questions for Thom Yorke in 'Dear Superstar' are witty and smart, and Yorke's insightful responses are hopefully a blueprint for future installments of this feature. And while the look into actress/model James King's music collection in 'My Music' would at first seem, like the cheesy cover of the premiere issue, too close to the undesirable world of regular Maxim, it's exactly the opposite. An intriguing and endearing feature, the piece goes much deeper into who King actually is than the glib one-on-one with Chris Robinson of the Black Crowes.

And that layout. Again, Bender doesn't take any chances, so you won't be seeing much cool stuff a la The Fader or Revolver. But it's so damn sleek looking that it's hard not to admire. The little charts and graphs that pepper the magazine along with the tons of photos, big and small, must have taken a lot of work to compile, and Blender never lets an inch of space go to waste, without ever looking too cluttered. Unfortunately, the avalanche of silly picture captions, while sometimes hilarious, do, like in Maxim, reach the point of overkill by about the 100th one.

So does Blender justify its existence? It sure could be a little more ambitious, and the writing won't exactly move you, but if Maxim readers gravitate towards this because of the name, they could do worse in a search for music writing. But more substance and more edge are necessary if Blender hopes to become anything more than a stepping stone for novices on their way to more engaging music writing.

Basement Jaxx bring the remedy to Boston

Axis Boston
July 19

The bottle of champagne in a bucket of ice set atop the DJ high rise certainly was misleading. Spotted as the clock struck midnight and Basement Jaxx began their 140-minute DJ set at Axis, the chilled bottle conjured thoughts of ascots, Moon Safari, six-inch cigarette holders, and lava lamps. This can't be what to expect from the Jaxx, whose new album Rooty gets even more down, dirty and sweaty than their last, the brilliant Remedy.

All fears were quickly blown away as soon as Felix Buxton and Simon Ratcliffe started spinning. Opening, appropriately, with a jacked up version of Redman's "Let's Get Dirty," the Jaxx's mission became clear. We won't be relaxing with long-stemmed glasses tonight, and the only use of the champagne will be to shake and spray at those who attempt to approach the stuffed this two hours straight) dance floor.

Sweats and exuberant, the pacing and energy of the Jaxx's selections faded all longings for what could have been. After all, the duo recently played a live set in New York that included Brazilian dancers and the requisite female vocalists. But their night at the Axis proved just how lucky Boston was to catch them on one of their few U.S. DJ appearances.

After the beat-heavy hip-hop hat trick that opened the night (with Missy Elliott's "Get Ur Freak On" and The Beatnuts' "No Escapin' This"), the rest of the time focused on hard-nosed house with a minimum of vocals. And, of course, Jaxx tracks. "Romeo" is the prototype for Rooty: a straight-ahead blast of energy that has you bouncing around the room rather than studying the intricacies of their compositions. That's dance music, right?

This hybrid of pop sense and transcendent dance energy is the album's biggest coup. The album clocks in at a restrained 40 minutes, and has the feel of a pop or rock record. Remedy had this too, but that felt like the masterwork that comes later in artists careers, full of peaks and valleys and changing emotions. That complexity often hid the album's pop aspect; Rooty exploits it, sounding like a brash and eager first record. Dance records, or most electronic music, in general, I feel like I have to be in the right mood for. Rooty is perfect for every mood, and in nearly every song you can hear the Jaxx smashing down the walls restricting electronic music to the despair of purists and the delight of all the rest.

Rooty also has all of the necessary ingredients for a crazy dance riot, as their Axis show proved. "Romeo" bounces right into the chic funk of "Breakaway," and "Just 1 Kiss" is playful with a mischievous wink. The dancefloor can still be one giant orgy, too, as "Get Me Off" proves, the spiritual descendant of Remedy's "Same Old Show."

As the bottom goes up on his imported beer, Buxton looks down on his sweaty followers with a sense of pride. Certainly, this was not a night to pop open the champagne and sit around talking about past glories. Jaxx 2k1 has the passion and drive of two that know they've got it, but still want it, and real bad. As "Red Alert" brings things to a close, we have Buxton and Ratcliffe to thank that "the music keeps on playing on and on."

Disjointed parody fails

SCARY MOVIE 2
Directed by Keenen Ivory Wayans
Starring Marlon Wayans, Shawn Wayans, Anna Ferris, Tori Spelling, and Chris Elliot

It was a high falutin' movie critic's worst nightmare: the original Scary Movie. This summer, it became a reoccurring dream as Scary Movie 2 burst onto movie screens nationwide during the Fourth of July weekend. After all, what better way to celebrate America than with some good old-fashioned urination, defecation, and masturbation jokes.

It is safe to say that the first Scary Movie was nothing short of a brilliant satire. Anyone who didn't like the first movie either A.) has no sense of humor B.) is too dumb to get the jokes C.) takes themselves way too seriously or D.) all of the above.

Scary Movie 2 offers more satire and crude humor around a plot that loosely parodies (among others) the format of the 1998 horror film The Haunting, as Shorty (Marlon Wayans), Ray (Damon Wayans) and Cindy (Anna Ferris) spend a weekend in a haunted castle in order to receive an "A" from their evil professor.

The returning characters are joined by some new faces, namely Chris Elliot who plays a demented caretaker with a deformed hand that he uses extensively while cooking, and Tori Spelling (in a completely dispensable role) as a naughty teenager looking for some ghostly loving, who gets her wish in a wild scene which parodies Hollow Man.

The second Scary Movie starts off much like the first with a well-done parody. In this case it's a horror fans wet dream of a film that is the brunt of the joke, The Exorcist. The scene ends with massive amounts of vomit spewed, and is one of the film's biggest laughs. This sets the film's tone: a few big laughs and smart parodies insinuated around a level of crude humor and dozens of poorly done parodies that leave the audience scratching their heads.

While the first Scary Movie managed to cleverly poke fun at the plethora of teen horror films of the past few years, the second parodies dozens of films not necessarily in the horror genre. Even the most ardent film buff will have trouble identifying exactly who and what is being made fun of in Scary Movie 2. A short list of films that is parodied includes Friday the 13th, American Pie, Ghostbusters, Paulie, Dirty Harry, What Lies Beneath, Rocky, Twister, Mission Impossible 2, Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon, and Dude, Where's My Car? And if you look closely enough you'll even catch the Save The Last Dance joke. The parodies are thrown at such a rapid fire pace that they become hard to digest. For instance, was a trash talking parrot that was a take off of The Weakest Link host Anne Robinson really necessary? And if it was, did it really need to be used a half dozen times throughout the film?

The writers (all seven of them...yes, seven) would have been better-suited poking fun at a few movies in a smarter, more recognizable way. Instead the movie spirals out of control with its constant barrage of attempting to make fun of anything and everything. It's as if Scary Movie 2 left nothing on the editing room floor, and simply put every single idea that popped into their heads onto the screen. The magnificent seven writers seem to adhere to the mantra that anything that references pop culture in any sort of way is automatically funny.

While Scary Movie 2's weaknesses lie in its excess of parodies, and virtually no semblance of pacing or plot, its strengths lie in still being able to provide a few big laughs. The only way it succeeds is by going to ridiculous extremes in its jokes. Whether it's a huge joint rolling up Shorty and smoking him, or Chris Elliot stirring up the mashed potatoes with what's left of his hideous stubble of a hand, the movie succeeds in being humorously over the top in many of its big jokes. The problem lies in tying the jokes together, and making Scary Movie 2 more than just a collection of R Rated Mad TV skits cleverly disguised as a movie.

MESHUGGAH
Rare Trax
Nuclear Blast

On the back of this Rare Trax the band actually describe one of their clips as "completely irrelevant material." How fitting.

Meshuggah have long been associated with musical insanity, but perhaps the most crazed thing that have ever done to themselves is release this useless album. Unless you are an utterly diehard fan, stay the hell away.

The ten songs on Rare Trax are, as you might expect, rare and unreleased tracks. Most of them are from the Psykisk Testbild album, Meshuggah's first indie release from '89. Poorly produced thrash, these songs were better left undiscovered. "War" is a legitimate good Meshuggah song, but the rest of the demos and remixes are just novelties for hardcore fans to amuse themselves with while everyone else simply ponders why they sound like they were recorded using the 'two cans and a string' system.

Now, while the songs on Rare Trax are simply irrelevant, the CD-enhanced material longs (LONGS) to be destroyed. Picture this: the band is on their tour bus. The guitarists are playing air guitar like a fifteen-year-old alone in his room, the drummer is sitting on a bunk hitting his knees with two sticks, and the singer is lip-synching into (yes) a red pen. This is, in its entirety, the video for "New Millennium Cyanide Christ" that you will find encased in mpeg format on this CD. It makes me wonder why they even bothered.

The other two (ahem) 'bonus' videos are a poorly recorded live performance of "Elastic" and a collection of random outtakes from the road and studio, many of which are in Swedish. There's nothing like a funny studio slip-up in a Scandinavian language to make me run out and spend my hard-earned money on a CD, let me tell you.

This CD is useless for even real Meshuggah fans, and for anyone else it acts as a legitimate intelligence-lowering device. Just stay away. (Rob Schulze)

Tube Notes is not for the marks

The clicker has been passed. The journalistic legends that formerly wrote this esteemed column have now moved onto to bigger and better things, such as hosting "Best of The Bluewall." Now it is my turn to lend my critique onto the world of television. Since obviously everybody on campus reads every single "Tube Notes" column, it's probably best that you the readers understand where I am coming from in my television watching habits. Well, here are a few of my opinions. I think "Must See TV" sucks. I think that the "Friends" cast is paid way too much to deliver lines that other people write for them. I think that Conan O'Brian should be on at 11:30 instead of Jay Leno, who in turn should be on at around 3 a.m., or better yet, cancelled.

An even better way to show what I think of television (and I know you care a lot), is to describe for you a typical day of television watching in my life. So here it goes.

11 a.m. - alarm goes off, hit snooze button.

11:09 a.m. - alarm goes off again, time to get up.

11:10 a.m. - shower, take dump, spend 20 minutes gelling hair.

11:57 a.m. - turn on boob tube for the first time, fitting with the name, Pamela Anderson is on a Baywatch repeat.

12 p.m. - time for Jenny Jones, (did you know she is like 50?) my personal favorite talk show. Today's topic: "Out of control teens sent to boot camp," my favorite topic. A preview for the next day's program shows that tomorrow's topic is "High School nerds get revenge on their bullies." A few marine drill instructors threaten to beat the crap out of some 14-year girls who wear a lot of makeup and proclaim that they "love to smoke weed."

12:51 p.m. - Order Wings.

1:21 p.m. - Wings arrives.

1:36 p.m. - a commercial for Cleo the Psychic with the Jamaican accent airs. In it she advises the caller to dump her husband of 9 years because "the cards" say he has been cheating.

1:58 p.m. - Jerry's Final Thought airs. Some business about how we must learn to love each other. No mention of the check he bounced while trying to pay a hooker a few years back.

1:59 p.m. - The two-hour talk show block ends, I realize just how great talk shows have become over the past few years. All semblance of reality has been lost. They don't even try to be legitimate anymore.

2:00 p.m. - Family Feud: This show used to be good, now Louie Armstrong is the host.

2:30 p.m. - The phone rings. They had the wrong number, like somebody would call me.

2:30-3:20 p.m. - Break from TV to check latest news on insider wrestling website.

3:25 p.m. - Big bowl of popcorn put in microwave

3:29 p.m. - Big bowl of popcorn burned.

3:30 p.m. - Time for TRL: Carson says today's show will be "very cool." Fred Durst is a special guest in studio today. A mysterious bulge is seen in Carson's pants upon his arrival. Sum 41 is number 2, and big surprise....NSync's "Pop" is number 1. The truth is I actually like TRL, and I have actually casted a vote for a Lil' Bow Wow video before.

5:00 p.m. - Time for the Evening news. Springfield local news is best, since the anchormen look into the wrong camera about a half dozen times per show.

5:07 p.m. - Order Wings.

5:29 p.m. - Wings Arrives.

6:00 p.m. - Post Wings nap.

7:30 p.m. - Crossfire- Now this is one great show. Two grown men screaming at each other about politics. In one particular moment when one of them talks, the other can be heard in the background saying "dream on." Very mature debating.

8 p.m. - Boston Public- One of the only things on network television worth watching. There's always something going on with its fast moving plotlines. Plus, the show doesn't preach some ridiculous self-proclaimed notion about how it is the "best drama on television," like a certain NBC show (West Wing) does.

9 p.m. - Since it's a Monday, it's time for Raw. Yea. I know it's fake, and so is "Friends," "ER," "West Wing," and even "Survivor." Yep, sorry to hurt anybody's feelings, but "Survivor" is rigged also.

11 p.m. - Order Wings again

11:28 p.m. - Wings arrives again

11:30 p.m. - The Howard Stern Radio Show-Letterman is a decent alternative to Stern, but thanks to the lovable Beetlejuice, Stern is the king of late night. Flipping over to lay Leno's monologue results in three Lewinsky jokes, two jokes about Bush's daughters drinking, and one O.J joke in just two minutes. Real creative lay.

12:30 a.m. - Along with the Silver Bullet, the best nightcap one could ask for is The Conan O'Brian Show.

Well, that's it, a day of television watching in my life. Keep in mind this is a purely hypothetical day since the friggin cable guy has yet to show up at my apartment.

Neptunes deliver jagged solo bow

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

N.E.R.D.
In Search of...
Virgin

Note: This review was written in June based on a promotional copy of the N.E.R.D. album. The album was given an extremely limited release and is now being scrapped, according to Entertainment Weekly, in favor of a re-recorded album that will include live instrumentation. N.E.R.D. member Pharrell Williams said of the ditched album, "you had to drink or smoke to get into it. The music and lyrics were there, but the magic wasn't." I couldn't agree more.

When the N.E.R.D. (the No One Ever Really Dies alias of production superduo the Neptunes) single "Lapdance" came through the basement last semester, it came attached with a long list of all the Neptunes' production marvels, from Noreaga's "Superthug" to ODB's "Got Your Money" to Mystikal's "Shake Your Ass." Impressive, no doubt, it also looked like justification for why we were going to be subjected to a full Neptunes/N.E.R.D. album, because they've earned it, after all.

We've traveled this road before (see Timbaland's Tim's Bio), and will no doubt travel it again (countdown begins now for Swizz Beatz' LP bow). The problem arises similar to the one experienced when a singer splits from a group; it's just not the same. The singer does a solo project with crappy music, and the band gets some new singer who's not as good, and nowhere is the vital energy created by the two forces together.

That lack of magic (and maybe big-name artists) is the main problem with In Search of.... Nearly all of the Neptunes' previous work could easily be listened to as instrumentals, since they were great pieces of music even before the artists had their way with them. But you wouldn't want to listen to just the instrumental, since the performance elicited out of he artist by the music was what made them classics. On In Search of..., Pharrell Williams and Chad Hugo have toned down the immediacy of their beats in favor of creating real, serious songs. That would be well and good if the songwriting wasn't so shaky. There's certainly no shortage of hooks, but the material, although personal, seems entirely detached, as if they lacked the guts to be truly emotional and opted instead for cheeky rhymes and simple verses. Flashes of brilliance are all over the album, and "Lapdance" is just ace, but for the most part it's disappointing.

DMB cool and collected at Foxboro

DAVE MATTHEWS BAND with MACY GRAY
Foxboro Stadium
June 16

Abercrombie and Fitch. Weed Smoke. $10 tans. Yah dude. Sold out. A1. Elena. Cool breeze. Gridlock. Empty fraternities. "What'd he say?" Tailgate. Booze. "Omigod, Satellliiiiiite!" Hemp bracelet. Humid. Puke n' run. Red eyes. Calm. Chill. Dave Matthews.

Due to the entirely expected mob scene surrounding the stadium and surrounding parking areas, I only got to see half of Macy Gray's last song, Macy's funky purple get-up and the horn portion of Outkast's "SpottieOttieDopaliscious" during the jam middle of "I Try" makes me think I missed a pretty cool set, though.

"There's a little moisture in the air," Matthews announced early in their 2+ hour set, addressing the thick humidity that filled the stadium. This would be the last intelligible between-song crowd address Matthews would make, all future statements spoken in a rambling, boozed Louis Armstrong voice that nonetheless elicited big pops from the loyal crowd.

DMB's playlist focused almost entirely on their new album Everyday and lesser-known older material, which seemed a logical choice but created a decidedly more mellow atmosphere at Foxboro than could have been achieved by throwing out one or two big hits.

The crowd, although always appreciative, never got as riled up for the new material as they did for some of the older stuff, especially "Satellite," for which Matthews brought out singer Angelique Kidjo, who opened the show. "I Did It" came close though, its jangly, grabbing guitar opening coinciding with the start-up of the six giant screens that surrounded the stage.

Opener "When the World Ends" definitely set the tone for the night, laid back but not lazy, lively but not rousing. Only the title track from the new album came close to inspiring, with its revival urge to clap your hands above your head and swing your hips. Sappy love ballads "Angel" and "The Space Between" are victims, live and on record, of Matthews' least passionate songwriting. But the kids loved them, and ate them up, even if I didn't. What I loved was the dark and propulsive "What You Are," a great song truly enhanced by the night air.

DMB's greatest feat of the night was transforming a stadium setting into a personal and welcoming atmosphere. The stage was completely bare, save for the screens and some modest pillars. There were no fireworks, no crazy stage antics. There were many times during the carefully chosen set that one could easily forget that they were among 50,000 people.

Even the quiet encores, including a Willie Nelson cover, were miles away from the usual 'let's please everyone' string of hits that characterize most large venue shows. No "Jimi Thing," no "Ants Marching," just a believable document of where the band is artistically at this point in time.

In this respect, the show was similar to the Black Crowes/Oasis bill at the Tweeter Center earlier in the week. Rarely heard tracks, rather than hits, characterized that show, proving that those bands, like DMB, have become comfortable enough in large settings to present the stadium atmosphere from dictating their approach. And while DMB's annual stop this year may not have been constantly gratifying, it was always comfortable, and distinctly satisfying.

Another season on the UMass brink

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

(Here were my predictions written before it all got started: I'm going to score myself to see how I'm doing.)

Maybe it's just me, but there's something exciting about a fast approaching sports season. Sure, the summer is great and everything. Nobody gets more pumped for a fast moving WUSA game than I do, but knowing that fall sports are just around the corner just does something more for me.

Let's just say I might be more excited than the Science Fiction Society is for the upcoming Lord of the Rings Trilogy. But with anticipation comes trepidation. After all, once that season gets rolling...well, once you're on the roller coaster, you can't get off, regardless of how fast its moving.

That's definitely the UMass condition: roller coaster. Like the Red Sox, there's always a frantic feeling to our teams. The Minutemen are incapable of plodding, machine-like, toward anything, championship or total disaster. So what's to look forward to?

Perhaps the following.

Possible Excitement: Jeremy Robinson, the sixth best safety in the country. In the country. For UMass, he might be the first defensive reason in a long time to watch the team on Saturdays. As long as he steps up to anchor the secondary, UMass should be able to focus on slowing the run. If the Minutemen can do that, at least we can keep the games close.

Possible Disappointment: the Coach Whipple teleconference call transcript on the www.umassathletics.com website. When Whip is complimenting the quality of players who don't play for us, be afraid. Like this:

"How does the quarterback situation look this year?"

"[Guice] played in the state finals his senior year, and the guys he threw to there are starting at schools like Tennessee and Missouri."

It's easy to get that "We're going to need a bigger boat" feeling when you read a quote like that, but to clarify, can Guice actually throw the ball, or was he dumping the ball on short slants and watching his receivers run?

Postscript: Well, after a weekend of play, Robinson came down with one interception, but the rest of the secondary got shredded. Guice wasn't allowed to throw the ball and the website said he still looked "shaky." Let's call it one for two.

Possible Excitement: Strength of schedule. UMass gets Marshall, Hofstra and Delaware in its first five games. Taking three of its first five games wouldn't be half bad for a UMass team that should be able to handle the rest of the season. Beating any one of those three teams would be an incredible boost for the younger Minutemen, and all three opponents will definitely put UMass in a hungry mindset for some of its lesser competition. It's not easy to predict a final record – last year was supposed to be Whipple's "best team ever" – but 8-3 doesn't seem totally unrealistic.

Possible Disappointment: Strength of schedule. UMass has to beat either Hofstra or Delaware because the Marshall game is a moot point. Why? Marshall just signed a three game series against Tennessee. That's the former national champion Volunteers. Meanwhile, UMass just signed a three game series against American International College. That's the number one western Massachusetts beauty school. If Marshall's third team isn't in by the end of the second quarter, it'd be a total shocker. And Marshall doesn't tend to let up on the opposition. Karma is countering our 77-0 drubbing of Northeastern a few years ago.

Postscript: I assumed UMass would beat William and Mary. That didn't happen. So realistically, let's hope to get out of our first five games at 2-3, and that's still hoping for a win against Hofstra or Delaware. Let's go one for two again. Batting .500. Solid.

Possible Excitement: Patty Shea's Field Hockey team might be described as rebuilding. It might be better described as reloading. After a Final Eight appearance last year, Shea's team is going to be hungry to prove that it wasn't a one-time deal. More than any other team on the field at UMass this fall, Shea's has every reason to be confident. They've been there. They've tasted it. They want it again.

Matt Guice better do more than throw short passes to Division I recievers.

Possible Disappointment: The team is going to have to recover from losing its best defender, goalie Zowie Tucker, and its best scorer, Kristen Schmidt. So if nobody steps up, making the NCAA's is going to be considerably more difficult. Nobody does anything on confidence alone. Casting a further dark pall on the team? Uber-wall Tucker is now coaching at cross-state rival Northeastern.

Postscript: Uhoh. We're rebuilding. We're 0-2. And Tucker's Northeastern beat us. I'll go 3 for two because I stole the Tucker idea from a friend.

Possible Excitement: There's nothing better than a bookended UMass soccer team. The team has one senior defensive standout, all A-10 Texan J.R. Pouncey, and one A-10 rookie standout, Travis Cooke. Now, Cooke hasn't played a game, but if he can play well, and Pouncey should stay solid, the team has a chance to shine. Why? Pouncey led a defense that gave up 19 goals last season. With another distributor in the midfield, the men's soccer team should be able to turn defensive stops into offensive gems, especially after Cooke gets the feel for the collegiate game.

Possible Disappointment: In maybe the biggest victory of the summer for the UMass men's team, Sam Koch's team beat the Western Massachusetts Pioneers of the USISL. I don't even know what USISL stands for. United States Inconsequential Soccer League maybe? Look, when a league has more than three letters for its acronym, be leery of the teams involved. (Don't believe me? See: USFL, USBA, NASL, WNBA) Not surprisingly, www.umassathletics.com confirmed that the Pioneers were low on players because too many didn't arrive on time. Others had work commitments. Weren't the WUSA (there's another one) teams available for a quickie?

Postscript: Umm, snap? UMass dropped its first game to Duke 3-0, but then beat NC State 2-1. I'll go one for two.

Possible Excitement: the Women's Soccer team has five preseason all A-10 picks. Five. Three of them are returning players, sure to provide the veteran leadership that last year's 11-7-1 is going to need to improve on that record. The other two are rookies including local star Stephanie Santos, she had 82 points in her final season at Ludlow. Rookies being rookies, it might take time, but with a solid returning core and exciting new rookies, there's no reason to believe that last years 1-0 loss to Xavier in the A-10 final might come out differently.

Possible Disappointment: the Holy Cross factor. An early season loss to Holy Cross decimated UMass Men's Basketball last fall. It all went downhill after that and ended with Bruiser Flint's dismissal. So what does the women's team do? Loses to Holy Cross to start the season. Jim Rudy, watch out. Fortunately, it was only an exhibition game. But the black cats are black cats.

Postscript: Overtime victory for UMass over hated cross-state rival Boston College, and who scored? Stephanie Santos. Remember, part of the Holy Cross theory is that UMass started its basketball season 0-5. So what does UMass lose to Connecticut by? 0-5. Call it two for two.

And there are always the extra possibilities that the fall season holds. The sudden emergence of an unknown player. The single game step-up from the forgotten senior. The steady performance. The big win. The big play. The close game. The nail-biter.

There's a reason why we all love athletics. Most of us never get to be fans of anything but the ruller coaster teams. Face it; with the Red Sox less than a hundred miles away, it's far too easy to get used to the highs and lows of sport. But with every new season, it's a rash of new possible highs, of new celebrations, of new ecstasies. If it doesn't work out, there's always next year, but right at the beginning, before it's all really gotten going? That's when it's the best.

Possible excitements are taking a whipping from possible disappointments. Doesn't look like it so far. Five and a half for 10 and I see, a bad moon risin'.

Water Polo eyes another championship season

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

It's time! It's time! It's championship time!

After an up and down 2000 season that ended with a third place finish at the Eastern Championships, the Massachusetts men's water polo team is looking forward to a shot at returning to the NCAA Tournament after a one year absence.

Coach Russ Yarworth's 15th season is one he has admittedly been looking forward to for a few years now. Returning last year's leading scorers along with carrying a dominating senior class that has seen a ton of collegiate pool time, Yarworth expects great things from this bunch, as long as his Minutemen can play like a team.

"We get the top seven scorers back this year," Yarworth said. "We are trying to get them to play more as a unit and supplement the 'I gotta score' ego to 'we've gotta score,' and find the best opportunity to do that."

Two-Meter

The two-meter position is the key to the offense; luckily it is also UMass's best position.

"Depth at two-meters is a real luxury to have, because playing the two-meter position is exhausting," Yarworth said. "Everyone will put their biggest, strongest player on that man. This will allow me to rotate in a fresh player. It will also allow us to look for mismatches."

Senior co-captain Mike Foley is one of three dominating forces Yarworth has at his disposal in the two-meter. The Tustin, Calif. native tied for first on the team with 65 goals and was third in scoring with 79 points.

"At 6-foot-6, [Foley] is a tremendous weapon," Yarworth said. "He'll be holding a position for a high pass where he can step out and get it. He's not really a power two-meter man. He is strong, but that's not really his style."

Fellow senior Adam Moore is more of the prototypical power two-meter man. He is able to bully a defender in order to get position in front of the net. But despite his ability to bench press close to 300 pounds, don't get stuck thinking he is purely an inside threat or he will toss one right by you.

"Not only does he control the position well," Yarworth said. "He is a tremendous outside shooter, as well."

Rounding out the top two-meter players for the Minutemen is senior co-captain Greg Trayer. The Reading, Pa. native is a very good all-around player with a brain for the game that placed second on the team with 27 ejections drawn last season.

"He will go in there and scrap," Yarworth said. "He can pass well, and he can set well."

Combined with stellar two-meter defense by senior Evan Lutz, all this talent will allow Yarworth to move his men around on offense, taking advantage of opening after opening.

"We are really having a lot more motion to the offense, and just searching out mismatches," Yarworth said. "Usually, in workouts, we are finding that our second or third option is the best offensive option. They only did it a little last year."

Field

Yarworth sees a lot of strength within his group of field players as well. The position is nearly as deep as the two-meter.

Senior Carlos Ramos is a terrific lefthander. The Puerto Rico native led the team with 101 points, 44 steals, and 36 assists last year while tying for the team lead with 65 goals.

Juniors Chad Arnold and Justin Houck add a ton of speed to the field position. Along with Ramos, these three can out-swim just about anyone.

"We've got [field players] that really get up and down the pool," Yarworth said. "Chad and Justin were both finalists in the Atlantic 10 in swimming and Carlos is a past finalist."

Goalkeeper

Lead by one of the top keepers in team history, this position, too, has a wealth of talent and depth.

Senior J.R. VanderWall's 250 saves and 116 quarters were good for second most in UMass single-season history. The 6-foot-5 Rockford, Mich. native has developed into one of the nation's top goalies and will be a solid anchor for the Maroon and White defense again this year.

"[VanderWall] has all the experience in the world," Yarworth said. "His technique and knowledge are good. He's got to lead the team defensively."

Ready and willing to step up in the goal are junior Rafael Santana and sophomore Rodrigo Gonzalez. Each player brings a different aspect to the game.

"[Rafael] is very tall, very good at blocking the ball," Yarworth said. "While Rodrigo is probably the most knowledgeable of all the goalies, but we've got to get him into the weight room and bulk up."

All this depth has led the 15-year coaching veteran to alter the mindset of top players.

"I've been selling the idea to the guys of less minutes this year, but harder minutes," Yarworth said. "That way teams are more worried about keeping up with us then analyzing how to win the game. We want to [be] creating the pressure all the time offensively and defensively.

"We are going to be subbing a lot. With the depth that we have, I am looking at playing a ten-to-twelve man rotation [and] always having fresh bodies in there."

Hartford beats UMass soccer

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

HARTFORD, Conn.- Déjà vu fell upon the Massachusetts men's soccer team when it surrendered to the University of Hartford in a 2-1 decision last night at Yousof Al-Marzook Field.

A year ago today, the Minutemen lost to the Hawks in a similar 2-1 contest that left UMass looking back at the not-so-distant past.

The Minutemen scored first Wednesday evening when junior Jeff Deren took a cross from senior Fred Kinateder and put it by Hartford keeper Chris Doyle. But the Hawks were quick with a reply, as Marcin Just slipped the ball passed Maroon and White goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn five minutes later.

Hartford roared into the second half, and ran the UMass defense weary. The result was a Hawk header from freshman Alon Lubezky that flew into the net at the 73rd minute of play. The Minutemen were held to just three shots during the second half.

"We didn't follow the script. We were supposed to score three goals," head coach Sam Koch said. "We didn't mark up as well as we needed to."

The best sweeper in the Atlantic 10 J.R. Pouncey left the game after 76 minutes on the field with an injury. His status is uncertain.

The Minutemen drop to 1-2 on the season.

Duke; Saturday, Sept. 1

UMass headed below the Mason-Dixon last weekend to Raleigh, N.C. to play in the Adidas Wolfpack Classic. The Minutemen faced up against No. 15 Duke last Saturday and found result a 1-0 defeat. The season opener was a flat-out attack on UMass as the Blue Devils netted their first goal in 22 minutes. The Minutemen were held to only 6 shots while Duke pushed 17 shots through the defense. The Maroon and White were able to keep pace with the Devils – despite their advancement – and held the team to just one goal until the final 12 minutes. The Dukies drilled a goal past O'Quinn and eight minutes later the ball saw the back of the net for a third time.

"We just didn't play well and they beat us. Pretty plain and simple," Koch said. "They didn't miss a beat. We made mistakes."

North Carolina State University; Sunday, Sept. 2

After a first game loss at the weekend Classic, the Minutemen set out against host NC State and upset the Wolfpack, 2-1. UMass battled back after NC State dropped in the first goal at 25 minutes. The Wolfpack, out for revenge after losing to Northeastern University earlier in the tourney, gave UMass a little help just before the half after NC State's Brock Trejo was given a red card and ejected from the game, giving the Maroon and White a one-man advantage for the rest of the contest.

UMass was quick to pounce during the second half when Yuri Morales played a through ball to Jason Golesky to score just after 40 minutes. The unassisted game-winning goal was scored by Morales 15 minutes later during a scramble in front of the NC State net.

The Minutemen, now 1-2 on the season, are looking toward improvement as the schedule begins to pick up.

"We need to be more creative and tighten up marking," Koch said.

The Minutemen will host Boston University in their home opener Sunday at Totman field.

Corley said. "When you're going to come up and press a guy with [Musinski's] speed, if you don't get your hands on him, then, what happened today is going to happen."

Musinski's second touch came with 5:43 left in the third quarter on a six-yard loft from Corley into the back of the endzone. His third score came just under five minutes later when Corley found him all alone near the left sideline. On both plays, Minuteman senior defensive back Eddie Bowman was the victim of Musinski's sharp, calculating routes.

"We came in and knew what we had to do," Musinski said. "We just found a way to get open using our technique better than they did."

Musinski is one of the most gifted and talented receivers in the Atlantic 10. And his dismantling of a fast and talented UMass defense is a testament to that.

Most of the credit, however, should be attributed to his pigskin I.Q. Sure, Musinski was a little banged up Saturday afternoon, but he remained mentally healthy. There's always more fun in outfoxing opponents.

On Saturday, UMass coach Mark Whipple employed the 4-4 defensive scheme - a four defensive linemen, four linebacker, three defensive back set.

The 4-4 defense works like a zone, zone in which the fourth linebacker and the safety (third defensive back) must communicate to pick up any potential receivers coming off the line of scrimmage or out of the backfield.

What coaches and offensive coordinators do to counteract this defense, is line up a third receiver at split end. Add that to a tight end or a running back in the flat and at least one linebacker will be forced into coverage.

In the Tribe's case, coach Laycock took the game plan one step further. He fielded his best receiver – Musinski - at split end, so if a safety picked him up, he had a mismatch, and if a linebacker marked him, he had a touchdown. Just ask Anton McKenzie and Eddie Bowman.

answered by a patented Bruemmer penalty corner slap shot. That was where the score remained, until Anderson was able to knock home her unassisted game-winner.

"It wasn't that we weren't prepared," Egland said. "We were jittery and our nerves got to us, but we kept fighting throughout the game."

"From game to game we have shown steady improvement," Blue added, talking about the first two games of the season as well as yesterday's victory over Boston College. "Each line just needs to work on something different so that we can come together as a team."

And if UMass does come together, it will once again be a force in Division I field hockey.

scare in the second half, as a melee in front of the UMass goal left co-captain Kerry Ann Jaggassar writhing on the turf. The senior had taken a stick off her right knee, and did not return to action after limping off the field.

"She didn't twist it, and I don't think there's anything structurally wrong with her knee," Shea said. "We'll have to just let the doctors check her out and wait and see."

One bright spot for the Maroon and White was the play of its many younger stars. Egland finally looked relaxed between the pipes after two subpar outings (four goals allowed in each of the team's first two losses), something she attributed to more cohesive play from her defense.

"[The backs] today did a great job, not only of marking but of communicating with each other and me," Egland said.

Several freshmen players took advantage of generous playing time and turned in solid efforts. Maine original Ashley Gilbert was readily used as a delayed shooter on penalty corners (especially in the second half), while fellow first-year player Adrianne Monaco parlayed her third-straight start into a showcase of midfield highlights.

"Adrianne has great stick skills, but she also has a great mind for the game and that's what you need in your midfielders," Shea said. "She helps us in a lot of ways."

And after playing a multi-faceted role in the win (including pushing on a late penalty corner), the New York native seemed truly thrilled to have finally tasted life in the win column.

"It's just…well, it's incredible. There really is no other word to describe it," said Monaco of her first collegiate victory. "This is the best feeling there is."

The team now gets the luxury of an eight-day layoff before returning to action Sept. 14 against Louisville. Shea said that her team welcomes the break as a time to shift its focus toward some off-field priorities like academics and recovery from injuries.

"The layoff is a tremendous help, something that we schedule on purpose," Shea said. "With the start of classes, it helps the players strike a balance between academics and athletics as well as getting healthy again."

Opening pass-back for the Louisville game, also at home, is slated for 3:00 p.m..

Boston College awaits the blast.

Field Hockey

What a difference a year makes.

Last year, the Massachusetts women's field hockey team did not give up its eighth goal of the season until its 10th contest, a 2-1 victory at home against rival UConn on September 30, 2000. The Minutewomen would continue its nation-leading defense (0.74 goals per game) for the remainder of the year, stifling opponents on the way to a 19-4 record and a berth in the Elite Eight.

However, after two games, this season has begun quite differently. The University of New Hampshire racked up four goals on the Maroon and White on August 31st, while Northeastern matched the Wildcats by knocking off UMass 4-2, three days later.

All of this has meant that the Minutewomen have struggled mightily to replace last years superstar graduate, Zowie Tucker, even with a defense that has remained largely in place.

"I'm not trying to fill her shoes, I'm trying to create my own style," sophomore netkeeper Ashley Egland said about Tucker. "I have a completely different style of play and I'm younger and need more experience."

Nonetheless, it was especially hard to avoid comparing Egland and Tucker when Northeastern squared off against UMass on September 3rd, due to the fact that Tucker is now an assistant coach for the Wildcats. With mixed emotions, she watched on the sidelines as her former team struggled defensively against her current squad.

"We need to see different combinations and it is still early in the season," head coach Patty Shea said, a year removed from yet another Atlantic 10 coach of the year award. "Last year I think we used a different starting lineup in each of the first 10 games."

On the positive side, UMass' offense looked fairly impressive in both games, using balanced scoring to keep the two contests competitive, which was a welcomed cry from a season ago, when the Minutewomen often struggled to put the ball in the net.

"We have a lot more players that can create with the ball," Shea said. "The players worked hard over the summer and when we get within the 30 yard line, we are going to goal."

Against Northeastern, the Maroon and White dug itself an early hole by allowing a Sarah Broderick goal less than a minute into the contest. However, the Minutewomen clawed their way back, tying the game on an Anke Bruemmer penalty corner blast, and taking the lead on an unassisted Erica Whiston score just a minute and a half later.

It was Whiston's second goal of the year, already eclipsing last year's total for the junior forward from Athol, MA and displayed exactly the balance that Shea was talking about.

Things went downhill for the Maroon and White in the second frame, though, as Broderick again scored less than a minute into the half. Six minutes later, Maureen Connolly gave Northeastern the lead, and Broderick finished off her hat trick at the 19:19 mark, and also ended any realistic chances of a UMass win.

"Our intensity wasn't there the whole time, it came in spurts," forward Stacy Blue said, who will be called upon to carry a larger portion of the offensive load, due to the departure of last year's leading scorer, Kristen Schmidt. "We made mistakes, but we will learn from them and go from there."

On opening day against another group of Wildcats from New Hampshire, victory was in the grasp of UMass until Heidi Anderson broke a 3-3 tie at the 8:46 mark to give her team the 4-3 win. Throughout the game, it was a back and forth battle, and neither team were able to amount more than a one-goal lead.

Marcie Boyer opened up the scoring for UNH seven minutes into the contest, but she was matched by Whiston at the 16:42 mark to tie up the score. Kaitlyn Byron then gave the Minutewomen a short lived lead, as Boyer's second tally sent the teams into the half deadlocked at two.

In the second frame, Jennie Peyser gave the Wildcats the lead, but was Oreos. Boston Creme donuts. The Massachusetts volleyball team. The common thread between these three things? The best part comes in the middle.

The Minutewomen (2-2) brought out the cream filling of their play in the middle of each game of their sweep (30-20, 30-20, 30-27) of Northeastern Tuesday night. Senior Lauren Vander Veen's 14 kills led the UMass offense in its 2001 home debut. On the defensive side of the ball, junior Jitka Stehnova and co-captain Lymarie Llovet paced a strong team effort with 16 and 10 digs, respectively.

"I thought we played very hard," head coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We frustrated their offense. I thought our defense was very good and we were very disciplined."

In game one, Northeastern (1-5) came out of the gates strong to post a 16-10 lead behind three kills by Lindsay Wagner. But the Minutewomen mustered a five-point rally highlighted by two Llovet kills. Then, trailing 17-15, a kill by senior Celia Wirtz sparked a ten-point string to propel the Maroon and White to a lopsided victory.

In the second game of the match, the two teams combated back and forth in the early going. With UMass holding a slight 12-10 advantage, the Maroon and White defense held strong and earned four straight points by forcing Husky miscues. After a block by Northeastern's Erin Spangler, co-captains Janeen DeMarte and Llovet notched back to back kills to give the Minutewomen a strong 19-11 advantage.

"In game two, Lymarie and Janeen took over at the net," Kenny said. "Their hitting gave us the momentum in the match."

DeMarte then notched four kills to lead the Maroon and White to its second consecutive 30-20 triumph.

"Janeen did a great job hitting the ball down the line," Kenny added. "That was our game plan coming in and she was the only one who did that. We didn't run the middle a lot – I thought we could have established the middle a little bit earlier so we could have gotten more one-on-one opportunities outside."

The third game seemed eerily similar to its predecessor, as the two squads were again neck-and-neck out of the gate. UMass used yet another mid-game rally, this one a five-point run, to put themselves up 20-12. But this time, Northeastern had no intentions of letting the game slip away from them, as a six-point streak left them down just three at 22-19, with newcomer Carol Mattos stopping the string.

The Huskies pressed on, though, and a 4-0 run left them tied with the Maroon and White at 25. But the seniors showed how badly they wanted to win their home opener, as Llovet and Vander Veen each posted two kills and a block to propel UMass to the 30-26 victory.

"I thought our offensive production was a little shaky, but I thought our defense kept us in the match," Kenny said.

"I like the fact that we can play as hard when we were only up by one as we did when we were up by 10 earlier in the game. We played much better at the end of this match."

This past weekend, the Minutewomen posted a 1-2 record as they traveled to Storrs, Conn. to participate in the Ikon Husky Tournament.

In the first match of the weekend, the Maroon and White dropped three straight games to host UConn (25-30, 25-30, 20-30). Vander Veen and Llovet, who each notched seven kills, were among the only bright spots for an offense which only posted a .054 hitting percentage for the match. Llovet led the Minutewoman defense with 12 digs.

"We had first game jitters and our offense was horrendous," Kenny said. "UConn was much more physical than we were and they dominated us at the net."

UMass fared far better in their second match of the tourney as they trampled Texan Christian University in three games (35-33, 30-24, 30-25). Sophomore Nitia Small and Llovet each notched 14 kills in the victory, as the Minutewomen posted a .247 hitting percentage to bury the Horned Frogs.

"TCU was a pretty good team and I like the fact that they came to New England to go 3-0 and left 0-3," said Kenny, who is in her ninth year at the helm of the Maroon and White. "We had to play very well to beat them. The key to that match was getting the first game 35-33. I thought our offense was on fire there."

The third game pitted UMass against West Coast power UCal-Berkeley and saw the locals fall to their counterparts in consecutive games (26-30, 20-30, 22-30). Small was again on top of her game, as she threw down 13 kills to lead the overmatched Minutewomen. The Golden Bears posted a whopping .354 kill percentage in the match.

"Berkeley was a much more athletic team than we were, better attacking-wise than we were," Kenny said. "That was the best match we played, and Nitia and Lymarie played excellent. Our offense against TCU and Berkeley was excellent. We played hard all weekend and I was pleased with how the weekend went."

Llovet earned All-Tournament honors for her .267 kill percentage to go along with her fine defense, as she posted 33 digs for the Maroon and White.

UMass is in action again this weekend as they host the UMass Invitational. The three-game set will take place at Curry Hicks Cage this Friday and Saturday.

player." Tsantiris said of Ranta who just returned to the side following a stay with the Finland National Team at the World University Games. "She has great vision so she finds the right passes and tactically she the best one we have."

UConn opened the scoring in just the 5th minute when junior midfielder Megan Almanzo fired a 25-yard rocket past Podhrasky which caromed off the underside of the bar and over the goal line to give UConn a 1-0 lead.

Nothing seemed to go right on the afternoon for the Minutewomen who only managed four shots on the UConn net, none of which caused either Husky goalie much trouble. Husky starter Erin Rice was only forced to make one save in the first half while backup Maria Yatrakis made three in her 45 minutes of action. Podhrasky had six saves for the Minutewomen.

"Hopefully this will be that first weekday game and we'll get it out of our system and that's it," Rudy said.

The Minutewomen return to action a week from Friday on Sept. 14 when they travel to Athens, Ga. to take on the University of Georgia Lady Bulldogs.

The Minutewomen put the pressure on the Eagles from the get go, keeping the ball on their half of the field, taking the lead at 17:11 on a goal by Kathleen Machamer, assisted by Alexi Rudd.

Freshman Stephanie Santos shook off any debuting butterflies and scored in her first collegiate game, from Katelyn Jones and Michelle Lutatti, doubling the lead to 2-0 going into halftime.

Head Coach Jim Rudy didn't let up in the second half, keeping the pressure on the BC squad.

"[I knew] that we really had to play great for the first 15 or 20 minutes of the second half," Rudy said. "So whatever they throw us, we can deal with it."

The pressure led to a Jones score, from Machamer at 49:19. At 3-0, the game seemed out of reach, but at 60:00, the Minutewomen, who had been outplaying the Eagles at every aspect of the game, seemed to run out of gas.

"They couldn't play at our pressure for the first 60 minutes," Rudy said. "We probably played so hard that we played ourselves out, trying to get an extra goal or two."

Meghan Moore scored at 61:53 and the BC squad began to believe in a rally.

"When they got that one goal, all of the sudden, mentally, it sort of turned [in BC's favor]," Rudy said. "We lost control of the game defensively. We started reacting to what they did instead of taking initiative and anticipating, and that was the difference [between the first and second halves]."

Lindsey Fairweather pulled Boston College to within one goal at 78:29 on an unassisted bouncer that barely crossed the plain of the goal passed UMass goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky.

The Minutewomen's lead was completely erased with just 2:14 left in regulation. The Maroon and White held onto the 3-3 tie, sending the game into sudden death overtime.

The first overtime looked strikingly similar to the second half, with just one exception: Podhrasky was a wall in net for the Minutewomen. Two diving saves and a handful other big plays from last year's A-10 Defensive Player of the Year kept UMass alive and sent the game into its second overtime.

The Maroon and White offense finally woke up after more than 50 minutes of naptime. The UMass offense took control soon after the second overtime kickoff and refused to yield.

The Eagles were soon swarmed by the Minutewomen and finally gave up the game-winner to senior Brooke Bartlett with Martha Conover making the assist. Coach Rudy had switched Bartlett, usually a right-side midfielder, over to the left side forward.

"[We needed to] get through regulation and survive the downhill overtime," Rudy said. "Then we made a little change. We flipped Brooke off to the left side and brought on Andrea Trujillo, right-sided midfielder, and she held that. And [Brooke] ended up getting the winner over there."

Coach Rudy was happy to start the season off with a win against a tough team, but was obviously concerned about the collapse at the 60-minute mark.

"We need to carry this pace up to 75 or 80 minutes," Rudy said. "We have to play hard to be good. We can't just show up."

UMass gets the boot

Minutewomen shut-out by No. 9 Huskies

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Prior to Wednesday afternoon's meeting with the University of Connecticut, all news coming out of the Massachusetts women's soccer camp had been positive.

Following a dramatic 4-3 double overtime victory over Boston College Saturday night in its season opener, the Minutewomen climbed into the polls at No. 19, marking the first UMass ranking since 1998.

However, the good news ended there as the No. 9 ranked Huskies stormed into town and cruised to a 5-0 victory last night at Totman Field. Five different Huskies scored on the afternoon as UConn (2-1) dominated the Minutewomen (1-1), out-shooting them 22-4 en route to the victory. The Minutewomen looked somewhat fatigued following Saturday night's marathon match with which BC and UConn took adavantage.

"This did not look like us today," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "I didn't recognize anything we did today, it didn't look like us. Not one thing. We didn't do anything today, there were opportunities, we just didn't do it. We were flat."

UConn senior midfielder Kaycee McElree struck the fatal blow to the Minutewomen with just 42 seconds left in the first half when she received a pass from sophomore Shelby Brownfield and chipped a shot past UMass goalie Julie Podhrasky into the top left hand corner of the net to make the score 2-0 for the Huskies.

"I think, 1-0 at halftime – it's no big deal, 2-0 – well it's reachable, but it's a whole lot harder," Rudy said. "We were just hoping they would manage the time a bit better before halftime."

The Minutewomen came out a bit more poised and determined in the second half but still had trouble linking together a string of passes and keeping possession, especially in the middle third of the field. This allowed UConn to get forward quickly on the counterattack and put constant pressure on Podhrasky's net.

"We were able to pressure the ball and win the ball in different parts of the field and then we were able to keep it," UConn coach Len Tsantiris said. "I think that is very tough to deal with. UMass is a good team, they just had an off day.

Podhrasky made a string of saves to keep the Minutewomen in the game through the first 25 minutes of the second half but as the game wore on a breakthrough was imminent and finally came in the 74th minute through Jessica Gjertsen. Husky defender Lauren Naida sent a right wing cross into the UMass box which Alexa Borisjuk nodded down for Gjertsen who placed a right-footed volley past Podhrasky to make the score 3-0.

The third goal seemed to take all the wind out of the Minutewomen's sail and the Huskies began to knock the ball around with aplomb and purpose. UConn dominated the final 15 minutes of the match and looked odds on to score again, which it did, twice in the final ten minutes of the match.

Kristen Graczyk scored in the 82nd minute as she side-footed a shot into the bottom right corner of the UMass net off a through ball from Salla Ranta, who had caused problems for the UMass defense all day. Lacey Toups rounded out the scoring in the match's final minute as she headed a cross from Jen Amaio past Podhrasky to complete the 5-0 scoreline.

"She is very tactical, a very smart

AGAWAM – When competing at anything – sports, cards, whatever – there's a certain feeling you get when it starts to fall apart. When you were convinced that victory was in your grasp and then it slipped away. And there is nothing you can do about it.

That fear doesn't always have to break you; sometimes it can make you better.

It made the Massachusetts women's soccer team better last Saturday when it averted a potential heartbreaker to Boston College in a thrilling double overtime season opener. In the 112th minute of play, senior Brooke Bartlett drilled a Martha Conover dish past BC keeper Meredith Crotty, sending the Agawam crowd into frenzy.

UMass clips Eagles wings under the lights

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

WHEW!

Yes, that collective sigh that just echoed across field hockey nation was indeed coming from the Massachusetts Minutewomen. After a pair of forgettable losses at New Hampshire and Northeastern, the Maroon and White finally righted the proverbial ship with a 2-1 win over Boston College last night at Richard F. Garber Field.

The offensive firepower for UMass (1-2) came courtesy of senior Anke Bruemmer and junior Stacey Blue, with both goals coming in the first half. Sophomore goalkeeper Ashley Egland racked up six saves for her first win as a UMass starter.

The reversal of fortune experienced by the Minutewomen came just in time, as head coach Patty Shea admitted that a loss to the Eagles might have spelled trouble for her young squad's collective psyche.

"This was a game that could've gone either way, and with each loss those shoulders start getting heavier and heavier," Shea said. "But now that we've gotten that first win, I think we're going to be OK."

The Minutewomen's shoulders began to droop early against BC (1-2) as the Eagles drew first blood a mere 1:14 into the first half. The play started as a miffed BC penalty corner, but UMass couldn't clear the ball and Eagle Gina Dinan put home the second chance.

For the third time in as many games, the Minutewomen found themselves on the business end of an early 1-0 score.

"I don't know why we like digging ourselves an early hole so much," Shea said. "Maybe we just like the challenge or something."

Luckily for the fans in attendance, the home team did indeed rise to the challenge on its first penalty corner less than five minutes later. Despite having to adjust to two new ins on the UMass p.s. battery, sweeper Bruemmer stepped into a familiar role by blasting her shot past Eagle keeper Lauren Hill to knot the score at 1-1.

The Minutewomen kept the pressure on from there, as junior forward Blue slashed through the BC defense on the very next possession and got off another shot. Further aggression by the Maroon and White front line led to two more penalty corners around the 24:00 mark, though botched stops on both spelled wasted chances for the Minutewomen.

Blue noted that the unit had to contend with both new personnel and a change to the rules governing corners (the ball must now be stopped outside the circle, and brought inside by the stopper before it is struck).

"We definitely messed up a few of those [corners]," Blue said. "It's just a matter of adjusting, and it's something that we've gotten better at every game."

Having steadily gained momentum during the half, the Minutewomen jumped ahead for good at the 13:20 mark. Junior forward Erika Whiston spearheaded the attack by slashing to goal and bouncing a shot off Hill, but this time it was the Eagles who couldn't clear the ball and it cost them.

Blue gathered up the loose ball and shoveled it in for her first goal of the year and the third of her UMass career.

The home team got somewhat of a

Tribe whips Minutemen

Defense is a no-show in home opener at McGuirk

By Matthew F. Socco
Collegian Staff

After driving the final nail into the Maroon and White coffin, William & Mary place kicker Mike Nagelin took a bow. The gesture was not made out of arrogance; it was simply a cue for the Massachusetts football team to exit stage right, because this game was over.

The scoreboard read 17-10 (at the time) but in a sport where big plays are more important than touchdowns and field goals, the Tribe pitched a 3-0 shutout.

In last year's season opener W&M's fatal flaw was its inability in the clutch. The 2001 edition was nothing but the complete antithesis, as the Tribe dismantled the Minutemen 31-10.

"I think last year we missed a lot of opportunities and this year we just capitalized," Tribe QB David Corley said.

To say that William & Mary capitalized on its opportunities would be an absolute understatement. Whenever UMass gave an inch, the Tribe went for the jugular with a downfield pass, a trick play or an all out blitz on the quarterback.

W&M's first big play came with just under three minutes left in the first quarter. Down a field goal and needing a big play head coach Jimmye Laycock took his best receiver, Rich Musinski, and lined him up at split end hoping for a mismatch.

"We felt like putting Musinski in the slot could get us the match up we wanted," Laycock said.

It did indeed as Anton McKenzie, a linebacker, was forced to pick up Musinski as he came off the line.

"We were in a man zone with eight in the box, Anton wasn't supposed to be alone like he was," senior safety Jeremy Robinson said. "It was just another communication problem."

Musinski ended up beating Mckenzie on a 53-yard wheel route down the right sideline. He would score on the ensuing play.

With the Tribe offense answering coach Laycock's call, Mohamed Youssofi and the William & Mary defense decided it was time to make some plays of its own.

So with red shirt freshman Matt Guice starting his first collegiate game for Mark Whipple's Maroon and White offense, Laycock decided it was a good time to release the hounds.

On UMass' first offensive possession of the second quarter, All-America candidate Youssofi set the tone for the rest of the game by sacking the freshman signal caller and causing a fumble that would lead to a W&M field goal.

Despite his well-laid game plan, Laycock found himself in a 10-10 deadlock at the half. Instead it took some Tom Foolery by the quarterback to break the game open for the Tribe.

Late in the third quarter UMass found itself down by only a touchdown, needing a defensive stop. Corey Potter and Ian Dyche answered the call for the Maroon and White by stopping Tribe HB Komlan Lonergan twice for losses of two and four yards respectively.

Facing a third and long, Corley head faked the UMass "D" with a shotgun formation (frequently a passing set) before running a right side reverse Joshua Lustig for 24 yards and a first down, all but breaking the back of the Minutemen.

"That was a big play," Laycock said. "We were back on our heels, we were going into the wind and we felt like we shouldn't make a throw there. We wanted to continue to run the ball so we ran the reverse and [UMass] was just out of it."

For a coach and his staff it is a disappointing start to what could be a suicidal stretch for the Maroon and White.

"I was disappointed in our execution on both sides of the ball," Whipple said.

And for a young but talented team it is an undeserving conclusion to a week of grueling work and preparation.

Musinski dismantles defense

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

If asked for in the week prior to Saturday's ruin, the defensive affiliates of the Massachusetts football team could have easily passed along this information. William and Mary's Rich Musinski – the man wearing No. 44 – is the Tribe's primary receiver. And David Corley, William and Mary's quarterback, will throw to him.

How accurate that theory would have been.

Corley found Musinski three times to lead William and Mary to a 31-10 win over UMass Saturday at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

"We knew Musinski was going to get all the catches," senior free-safety Jeremy Robinson said. "It's very frustrating, especially when you're in practice – and you nail it – like, 'Musinski's going to get all the passes thrown to him, Musinski's going to get all the passes thrown to him...'"

The sophomore had seven other receptions to bring his game totals to 10 catches for 149 yards.

As a freshman, Musinski grabbed just three touchdown tosses the entire season, and averaged just 67.9 yards a game. Still, the Minutemen knew from last year's game – in which Musinski rumbled for an 86-yard score – that he'd be an offensive threat again in 2001. They prepared accordingly, but didn't execute that defensive scheme.

"Hard work is one thing, but you have to get your mind right before you go out there and play physical," Robinson said. "We just went in there and took it for granted. We knew he was a great receiver and we told him to show it to us and he really did. He stuck it to us."

Musinski's first score came with 23 seconds left in the first quarter. His feet inches from the endzone's left sideline, Musinski accepted Corley's throw for the 14-yard tally. Beaten on the previous play by Musinski for a 53-yard gain, UMass junior Anton McKenzie was again the wounded soldier on the Tribe's conversion.

"Those guys like to play a lot of press, but they really don't use their hands that much,"

James Young spoke at Amherst College about a photo exhibit illustrating the effects of the Holocaust.

UMass English prof talks about Holocaust

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

James Young, a University of Massachusetts English Professor, and Chair of the Judaic Studies Department, delivered a lecture yesterday at Amherst College's Stirn Auditorium on the differing ways in which nations memorialize the Holocaust.

The lecture, titled, "The Uncanny Arts of Holocaust Memory", dealt with various nations' roles in the Holocaust, and how these roles affected their attempts to build monuments to the tragedy. Young recently advised the German government on how best to build its own memorial.

His lecture dealt mostly with European countries such as Denmark, which unlike most European nations was able to protect most of its Jews from Nazi aggression.

"Denmark can often be self-aggrandizing [regarding the Holocaust]", Young stated, "and they should give themselves credit."

However, as Young explained, the Danish government turned away Jewish German refugees at the start of World War II. In response to this, a Danish Holocaust memorial featured images of the faces of Bosnian refugees projected onto a canal.

"This was to show how European countries were doing nothing for these refugees, and to remind the Danes that Denmark had shut off its borders before the war," he said, as he showed slides of the exhibit.

Young also displayed slides of German memorials.

"Many German artists think of an "everlasting memorial' as fascist," he said, "one which makes the audience into bystanders, and tells them exactly what to think."

One memorial that was built in an attempt to avoid this sort of "fascism" was a 12-meter tower in the German town of Harburg. Harburg's citizens, as well as visitors to the town, were instructed to write their signatures on the tower. As the list of signatures grew, the tower was slowly lowered into the ground. In 1993, seven years after the tower was built, it was lowered completely, and the town square now stands empty.

"The tower was intended not to be a place of remembrance," stated Young, "but a place to unburden oneself and forget."

In 1995, a contest was held in Germany, in which artists were asked to design an official Holocaust memorial, to be located in Berlin. Young was asked to advise the holders of the contest, and suggested that the government refrain from building one "official" monument.

Nonetheless, the contest was held. Among the suggestions were that a large bus station be built, with 600 buses traveling to the sites of former concentration camps. This proposal, although popular, was rejected because it was felt that sending people to Poland would place blame on the "outside."

Another artist suggested that the Brandenburger Tur, a triumphal German National Monument, be destroyed. The artist intended to spread its ashes around the city.

The winning design was for an enormous tilted stone slab featuring the names of 4,500,000 Holocaust victims. Young admits to despising the idea, particularly because it would incorporate materials from an ancient Israeli site where Jews once killed themselves rather than be enslaved by Romans.

Plans for that memorial were later scrapped. Another Holocaust memorial is now being built in Berlin by New York-based artist Peter Eisenman. His piece will feature 3,800 stone pillars of various heights placed in field. Visitors will have to find their own path through the pillars.

"It has the sense of a giant cemetery," said Young. "But there is no direct reference to the Holocaust." The purpose of the piece, he said, was not for the monument to "remember" the Holocaust, but rather for visitors to do so.

Young is the author of several books on Holocaust memory, the latest of which is titled At Memory's Edge. His lecture marked the unveiling of an exhibition at Amherst College's Mead Art Museum titled "Resistance and Rescue in Denmark: Photographs by Judy Ellis Glickman."

The new generation of pirates

Butterfield gives no quarter; the flag flies again

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Is it a warning of returning troubles, or does the new Butterfield just like pirates?

The black pirate flag appeared on the outside of the building, suspended from two third floor windows yesterday morning, but was taken down by the University of Massachusetts. UMass Housing officials have either refused to comment on the flag or have yet to return the Daily Collegian's phone calls.

"I can't give you an official statement on that," Van Meter-Butterfield Residence Director John Yaun said. "You'd have to call [Housing Director] Michael Gilbert or [Associate Director] Dawn Thompson."

The flag appeared some time Wednesday night, but according to some residents, there was talk of it earlier.

"I heard some kids talking about it, saying 'we got a pirate flag,'" Heather Noonan, an undeclared freshman said. "I don't know who put it up. I have no idea."

Also preceding the raising of the Jolly Roger were visits by unidentified former Butterfield residents.

"Some people from last year came up were surprised how much it was changed. A couple of people down the hall had people that lived in their room the year before, they wanted to see the new building," Noonan added. "It's better than Southwest. The building looks gorgeous."

Brian Doherty, an undeclared freshman, gave his opinion of the new Butterfield.

"Institutionalized is the perfect word for it," Doherty said. He also saw some old residents of Butterfield in the building "They gave a few inspirational speeches. Sneak in a keg, drink a lot, be really loud."

Doherty also knew something about the flag.

"This kid Joe; he was like 'I love pirates, man.'" Doherty said. "I'm all for it."

"Joe" is freshman Biology major Joseph Caruso, a self-described pirate fan.

"I was just doing it because I like pirates. Not the Pittsburgh kind, but the Captain thing; they're all cool. I think they though I was mocking them because of things that happened in the past," Caruso said. "I don't know what was going on then, I heard it was a little crazy."

University employees took down the flag.

"It has been taken down and we will be following up on this issue," Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos said. "We want this to stop, period. We will not allow the flag to fly again in Butterfield."

A message on Caruso's door told him to contact the Assistant Residence Director or the Residence Director. He says they informed that he couldn't do have his pirate flag hanging outside.

"I had to go see John Yaun. They took my flag," Caruso said. "I got in trouble for it. I had to explain to them that I like pirates. We're not trying to be jerks."

Dean of Students Joanne Vanin said that no disciplinary action was being considered at this time.

"The students did not know that it was not permissible to hang thing from the windows in the manner that they did," Vanin said.

But the students who put the flag up say that they were just trying to make friends.

"We're just trying to bring back a chill atmosphere," neighbor John Dziurzynski, a freshman Physics and Eastern Studies major said. "It used to be so cool."

Caruso thinks a big problem is the atmosphere isn't so "chill."

"A lot of kids are really scared. They don't want to come out; some don't want to leave their rooms. We're making it so that everyone can leave their doors open and nobody will steal anything. John [Dziurzynski] likes pirates. The other Joe [Caruso's room mate] likes pirates. All of my friends back home [Norwell, MA] are into pirates. We figure that we like pirates, and everyone likes pirates," Caruso explained. "It's our symbol for camaraderie. We don't want to make it a bad place; we want to make it a place where everyone can be friendly. We don't want it to be crazy; we just want people to be friendly."

Former resident Marc Rendazza, class of '94, was President of Butterfield from 1992 until 1994. He claims to hold a dubious honor.

"I actually put the first flag up, in the fall of 1992. Butterfield always had its own little community structure and we that Matt Ouellette (the area director at the time). It coincided with a letter you sent to the President George Bush seceding from the Union," Rendazza remembers. "The first one was on the balcony in front of the building. So I took and climbed up on the roof and we used to have a big short-wave antenna and we rigged it up there and it was there for a few weeks. It got taken down the night before some parents' weekend. We put it back up and that cheesed Housing off. After I left, it got taken down and people started painted it on the walls. That's part of what the pirate flag was about."

SGA meets to discuss number of electoral districts

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

An emergency Student Government Association Coordinating Council meeting was called to order last night to discuss finalizing the creation of only two Senate electoral districts from the traditional three.

After a year of conflict amongst the Senate surrounding the three electoral districts, and more particularly the Greek community, the meeting was held in hopes of permanently resolving all glitches within the SGA Constitution By-Laws regarding the electoral districts.

Last year the incongruity surrounding the three districts and members of the SGA resulted in a thrown-out Senate, and a backlash amongst the SGA and its members. The disagreement centered on the fact that the Greeks (fraternities and sororities) had unknowingly run under the wrong electoral district, being elected to commuter seats rather than the on-campus non-residential apportioned seats that the Constitution requires.

As a result of the turmoil, last April the Senate passed overwhelmingly a motion to change the By-Laws from having three districts (on-campus, on-campus non-residential and commuter) to just two electoral districts, the current on-campus and commuter.

Although the motion passed with more than the two-thirds vote required by the Constitution, Chancellor of Elections Sam Balaziak realized that there was one minor issue remaining, which he then presented to Speaker Aaron Saunders. In Title Two, Chapter Five of the SGA By-Laws it states that any changes regarding elections and the by-laws must also be passed by a referendum question the following election. Referendum questions are included on both SGA election ballots and must pass with a simple majority vote.

Saunders then proposed a motion to the SGA Coordinating Council that would have Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos approve a motion proposing that only two electoral districts be presented in the upcoming Senate elections. The motion was passed unanimously.

As a result, the motion will go directly to Cevallos and, if passed, a referendum question would then be placed on the on the election ballot regarding the electoral districts as procedure calls for in the SGA Constitution even though the two districts would already be in effect.

"I take procedure very strictly, but for the sake of the Greek community, the student body and the SGA I feel that this is something that should be taken care of now," Speaker Aaron Saunders said.

Questions arose from Council members surrounding getting publicity about the two districts out to those members of the Greek community and Saunders explained that this would not be a problem.

"It's our responsibility as the SGA to make a statement that this situation is remedied and that we want Greek involvement," Saunders said.

He continued to explain how he plans on speaking with members of the Greek community in order to ensure that the problems of the past do not persist in the future.

"We don't work in a perfect system and it's our job to work for the good of the student body and not just for the good of the By-Laws," Saunders said.

Lazer Rock 99.3 hosted contests outside of the Student Union.

Local radio station visits campus; Boomer gives out prizes and mugs

By Ryan Girard
Collegian Correspondent

Lazer 99.3 kicked off the semester with their annual back-to-school giveaway on the steps of the Student Union yesterday. It is the ninth straight year that Lazer has hosted the event.

Boomer, the radio station's promotional director and overnight disc jockey, was adorned in a black windbreaker and a black, knit winter hat. The weary eyes of the late night disc jockey peered behind dark sunglasses, looking for students who wanted the free merchandise. He declared to passing students, "Free stuff here..." and smirked as he later clarified "that means it doesn't cost anything."

Those who took advantage of the back-to-school giveaway were given a Dunkin Donuts travel mug with a free refill, bumper stickers, coupons, as well as Dunkin Donuts Chapstick on a rope. Boomer joked about the usefulness of the roped lip balm for prison inmates. "If you want to bring the Chapstick into the shower with you, you don't even have to worry about dropping it."

Students were invited to put their name in a grand-prize drawing. The winner receives complete dormitory furnishing, including a coffee table, futon and frame, a beanbag chair and a rug. The radio station gave other prizes such as DVDs, a mountain bike, and gift certificates. The drawing of the grand prize was to be later in the afternoon and the winner to be notified the following day by telephone.

Boomer, whose real name is Ben, is an alumnus of UMass; he graduated in 1999 as a BDIC major. The voice of the overnight broadcast and Sunday morning show is from Northampton and had laudatory remarks about his undergraduate years at UMass.

"It's like being a kid in a candy store: you just reach in and whatever you pull out, you make it your own...did I mention that the drugs are good?"

Initially, Boomer attended Denison University located in Grandville, Ohio, which he described as "the hell-hole of middle America." The disc jockey elaborated about his transfer experience from the small Denison campus to UMass.

"The cool thing about UMass is that it's a place where you get out of it exactly what you put in; if you want a world-class education you can get it here. You are exposed to so many different ideas about how the world is."

If you missed Boomer yesterday, you can catch him on Lazer 99.3 weekday nights from 10pm to 5:30am and on Sunday morning from 6am till noon.

As the school year starts anew, the Du Bois Library is soon to be a well-known building.

Race open for senate; SGA elections soon

On Tuesday, September 5th the Student Government Association's Elections Committee opened up the race for the Student Senate. Nomination papers were made available to students in order to be placed on the upcoming elections ballot.

Students interested in running should pick up nomination papers in the SGA office, room 420 in the Student Union. To be on the ballot for the Student Senate candidates must collect 25 signatures and return the papers to the SGA. The return date has yet to be announced to the student media.

The release of the nomination papers came as a shock to some members of the SGA, since the official date of the papers' release was not made clear in advance, explained Student Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders.

"I wish we could have had a little more communication, but we've just started publicizing and we've already had fifty people take out papers," Saunders said.

Elections are scheduled for September 19th; however, there is a feeling in the Senate that the dates could be subject to change. Saunders said that he personally would like to see the election date pushed back a day to keep with past precedent.

A decision has yet to be made regarding the issue.

Alvarez to speak

A reading by Julia Alvarez, acclaimed author of How the Garcia Girls Lost Their Accents, will take place tonight at McCulloch Auditorium in Pratt Hall on the Mount Holyoke College Campus.

Each member of the freshman class was given a copy of Alvarez's book as part of the school's "common read" program, which is part of summer orientation for new students.

While on the Mount Holyoke campus, Alvarez is planned to meet with students in small groups in an effort to promote common connections between students and thus make the transition to college easier.

"Creating common experiences is one of the ways that we encourage a positive transition. The common read enables students to discover connections with other students and to the intellectual life of the campus," Rochelle Calhoun, the associate dean of the College said. "It touches on themes that we hope to use to help new students examine their own transition from home to a college family to community, and dependence to independence and interdependence."

The novel tells the semi-autobiographical story of Alvarez. In the book, four sisters leave the Dominican Republic in 1960 and move to New York City. The novel won the PEN Oakland/Josephine Miles Award after it was published in 1991.

Alvarez teaches at Middlebury College and has published numerous essays, poetry, and three other novels. The reading is free and open to the public and the auditorium is wheelchair accessible.

Suspects arrested in N. Ireland bombings

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Royal Ulster Constabulary, the police force of Northern Ireland, arrested three suspects yesterday in Wednesday's bombing outside a Belfast school.

The suspects' identities have not been made public. Wednesday's bombing, which injured four RUC policemen, comes after escalating violence between Catholics and Protestants outside of Holy Cross Girls' Primary school. The Catholic school, located in a Protestant neighborhood, has been the center of protests as loyalists demonstrated outside during this, the first of school.

RUC officers dressed in full riot gear guarded the students, some as young as four years old, through a gauntlet of verbal protests Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

On Wednesday morning, a blast bomb rocked the Ardoyne neighborhood schoolyard, injuring four RUC officers.

"Two have shrapnel injuries, one has injuries to his ear and concussion and the other is suffering from shock," a RUC press release stated. "All have been detained in hospital. A police dog was also injured in the blast and is being treated by a vet."

Northern Ireland leaders have expressed their disappointment in this latest outbreak of violence, especially since it intended targets appeared to be school children.

"Once again the reputation of Northern Ireland across the world has been dragged through the mud by people of violence. Young children have been subjected to appalling attacks – another generation introduced to the shameful side of our society," Dr. John Reid, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said. "Any legitimate grievances of protesters have been drowned out by this violent sectarian bigotry. What we have seen develop in the past few days is the path to barbarism. I cannot believe the people of North Belfast want that."

"How can subjecting four-year-old children to such verbal and physical abuse possibly advance the cause of a community that has a grievance?" Security Minister for Northern Ireland Jane Kennedy said.

In the two days preceding the bombing, 41 police officers and two soldiers were injured. Fifteen blast bombs and 250 petrol bombs were thrown, and four cars were damaged. Automatic gunfire was reported in the Ardoyne area. RUC officials believe that there is no doubt that the target of the homemade bomb was the Catholic schoolgirls, their parents and supporters.

"Let's be clear about this. This is not an attack by them [loyalists] on police. We are incidental from their point of view," Assistant Chief Constable Alan McQuillan, Belfast RUC Commander said. "Most of the violence came from the loyalist side."

UMass relaxed about budget

By Shawn Ilinitch
Collegian Staff

The Office of Administration and Finance is not worried despite the fact the Massachusetts House and Senate have not come to an agreement on a fiscal year 2001 budget.

"We have a pretty good idea of how much money we are going to get," said Paul Page, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance. "The amounts in the House and Senate budgets are not far apart. We'll probably receive some amount in the middle."

The University is predicting a state appropriation of approximately $300 million, a 3.5 percent increase from last year.

The approval of the budget is hampered by the addition of the Clean Elections funding. The House wants the funding to include only candidates running for statewide office, while the Senate wants to extend coverage to legislative candidates.

The state budget runs from July 1 through June 30, so Massachusetts has been without a firm budget for more than two months. Since that time, it has been running on two-week interim budgets.

The House of Representatives passed a $459.6 million deficiency budget on August 23, and the Senate passed a $672.5 million deficiency budget on August 27.

While the University is confident of the amount of the funding they will receive, it is taking major steps to deal with the apparent lack of funding. As reported in Wednesday's Collegian, the Office and of Administration and Finance is taking major steps to accommodate a $1.8 million budget cut.

Although the University receives an increase in money from a state appropriation every year, it is not enough to cover the excess costs.

The 3.5 percent increase in the state appropriation is quickly gobbled up by an approximate $14 million dollar increase in spending in only five areas: salaries, Peoplesoft, research investment, infrastructure and athletics.

There are other smaller increases in other areas of University spending. The University has been careful about cutting money from the budgets of academic areas. While most areas on campus are receiving a 5 percent cut in their budget, academic areas' budgets are only being cut by 1.5 percent.

Construction around campus

Why the delays?

There is little more irritating than construction. Causing countless irritations and headaches both large and small, these investments in the future have the tendency to be seen only as current frustrations. This is nowhere more true than in the local construction projects now underway.

Beneath the surface, however, everyone knows that eventually the construction that they suffer through will lead to a more pleasant situation, or at least they hope so. Hopefully expanding and working on the Route 9 bridge will eventually accommodate the increase flow of traffic, and make traveling back and forth between communities easier and the renovation of the UStore promises to be beneficial because not only will it be free of pesky asbestos, but it also should be more attractive to students.

These are projects that effect all UMass students. Not to generalize, but it can be safely said that all UMass students have been on Route 9 and driven over the Coolidge Bridge for one reason or another.

Then there is the UStore. Though one does not drive their car through the UStore, there is definitely traffic in the Campus Center because of the construction, and because virtually all students must venture to the Campus Center or the UStore for one reason or another, every student is bound to encounter some frustration because of the project.

So after all of this background of traffic in the state, the town, and on campus, what is there to ponder? Well for one thing, isn't it interesting that all the construction from Boston to the Campus Center has either taken longer than originally slated, or is taking place at the most inappropriate time during the year?

For example, the Coolidge Bridge has been in need of repair for years and finally when they decided to fix it, they decided to fix it in the fall. Why not this summer, when the population of the area was at its lowest? Was it just a cruel joke on students by local residents to make their lives more difficult? Why didn't they at least start work earlier so that it wouldn't have to continue so far into the fall? What made them decide that Labor Day weekend was the best time to close all but one lane? Frustrating, isn't it?

As for the Ustore, didn't the University know about its asbestos problem years before now? Why didn't they start their construction earlier-say, years ago, when they first discovered the problem, instead of waiting until now to fix it? If the UStore had been re-done earlier then maybe there wouldn't be so much traffic in the Campus Center now, and perhaps those people working, studying and shopping in the building wouldn't have possibly been exposed to asbestos particles.

No matter what perspective one has, construction is a big pain. Some construction projects are inevitable, such as the bridge, but could have been planned better. The Big Dig also suffers from supreme inefficiency. Other projects could have been approached better, such as the UStore, which could have been moved in its entirety (like to the Cape Cod Lounge or something) so that students would still be able to purchase their academic planners, their deodorant and their t-shirts all in one place.

Either way all the construction in the neighborhood and in the state is occurring, so be prepared for much confusion, inconvenience and frustration at least throughout the fall.

We all walk the long road

MATTHEW DESPRES

It happened at some point last semester and, really, that's as specific as I've allowed myself to be. When this single, undetermined point in time came to pass in front of me, I put everything down and accepted what I then thought to be a fact set in stone: I was going to be kicked out of school.

Nice try, enjoyed having you, maybe you'll play again someday. That sort of thing.

Except that, when the dust settled, through some fortunate turn of events, I found myself back in school. It's where I wanted to be all along, no questions asked, but as certain events unfolded, the doubt quickly crept in, hinting all along that maybe this isn't where I should be.

The beauty of hindsight breaks everything down so simply: a job I loved which ate up increasing amounts of time, and certain classes that ultimately never got a second look. A missed class here and there? Not a problem, or so it seemed. Class work can't replace on-the-job experience, I thought, or imitate real life as it soldiers forever onward, the rest of us holed away behind some decorated University walls.

The math all seemed to add up. Experience, minus the extraneous waste that required general education classes often bring, seemed the logical road to take. And it is logical, in most cases, except the one that all of us are in right now: college, where most tested practices can be cast away in favor of an on the fly approach of simply getting by.

It's something I've been uncomfortable with for three years now, and have only recently accepted as the simple truth, a nagging problem that will only disappear once I do something about. The complaining is nice, offers brief periods of reprieve, but at the end of the day nothing has changed. The classes are still there, you're not, and the march towards the inevitable dismissal from all things academic has taken a giant step forward.

If you've been here at the University of Massachusetts for any substantial amount of time, it's something that you've almost surely become intimate with. The pursuit of some degree or certificate that becomes hampered by the Oz-like figure on campus, consistently and firmly reminding us from somewhere we aren't allowed, what will benefit us. Make us more well-rounded. Turn us into productive members of society carrying a full deck at all times.

> "[Required electives] take away from other more focused interests, and the precious time that could be spent indulging in them."

In theory it's nice, but in practice? It takes away from other, more focused interests and the precious time that could be spent indulging in them. It's an often-careless wave of that large hand herding us along, forcing us down paths we've consciously stayed away from.

It's something that certain people can get along with, while others struggle along, partly of apathy, but mostly of a driven desire in other areas. If you're a freshman finishing your first week at UMass, you'll find this fork in the road comes up a lot quicker than you may expect. If you're a returning student, you've most likely hit it already, and been faced with that seemingly simple decision of plugging away or fighting to get all that you've come here for in the first place.

There's no sage-like advice I'm offering here, just a simple pointer that I ignored for a good portion of my collegiate career: do the work. Go to the class. No matter how much you English majors out there turn away at the thought of math and various science requirements, just get it done. It's no fun for you, sure, and it's often unfair, but we all have to do it, and there's little logical sense in prolonging the experience.

You can get all that you want at this school, regardless of electives. In reality, it's not the classes I've been fighting, but rather a nagging stubbornness coupled with a "Why waste my time?" attitude. I've decided (and, by circumstances, been told) that a five year stay here isn't a shameful thing, that the two extra semesters I've afforded myself are making up the time lost at various points over the last three years.

The bottom line? If you're a freshman, don't pack it in early and often, as I regretfully have done on more than one occasion. We all walk the long road at some point in life, and that's fine, as long as the right motivations are pushing you towards a fruitful and satisfying end. The more time you allow yourself, the more you'll realize there's a lot here that's worth coming back to.

The crash course

DAN LAMOTHE

I am proud positive that one doesn't need to travel to far, far away to distant places to have a crazy summer. Everyone has his or her great summer vacation adventure and I'm no different. But I didn't go to Mexico, and I didn't go to Europe. I lived it up in good ole' Chicopee and man did I learn some lessons. First, never go to the beach a hundred miles from your home without a spare set of keys, because it is entirely likely that one of the people that went with you will lock the keys in the car. Second, going to a Staind show in Hartford is likely to produce people climbing poles and jumping from twenty feet up onto the crowd below. (Don't worry, it wasn't me. There isn't a snowball's chance in hell of getting me up that high without a seatbelt.) Lastly, things end up working out for the best. Let me explain.

For three weeks this summer, I was a mailman. I worked for that blue eagle, the United States Postal Service. It was supposed to be a summer job, but it really only last three weeks. Why? Because, my friends, I crashed a truck.

I crashed a mail truck. I crashed one of those lovely white vehicles that you see in your neighborhood. They call it a long-life vehicle (LLV) to be precise, though for the love of everything holy I don't know why. It feels like you're driving a tin shed around on wheels. Anyhow, I got hit, and that was that. You know what? I didn't care, and I still don't. How many people can say that they cracked up a mail truck?

> "Once I kissed fenders with the Cavalier, my fate was sealed."

Cracking up the mail truck was just a small part of that job, which I started with a passion after about two days. There were some kicks to it – driving the truck without a uniform (casuals don't wear them) is always good for a laugh, because when I pulled up at a traffic light in a backwards baseball hat and khaki shorts, other drivers rubbernecked into my truck trying to figure out if I had stolen it or not. The neighborhoods I delivered in ranged from oldschool Italian neighborhoods filled with semi-mansions to the hard knocks ghetto. Springfield's pretty much has it all. The carrier that I trained under even informed me one afternoon that a certain House 'A' in the middle of the mansions was the home of an alleged Italian gangster. I can't verify whether or not that was true, but I got a kick out of it, one way or the other.

The kicks were few and far in between, though. All of those days in early June where the mercury registered more than 100 degrees – yup, I was out there, dying in the sweltering heat. The postal service has their carriers walk with two stacks of mail at a time, one in the hand and one on the arm. Big mistake for me. My sweaty butt wrecked the bottom magazine in the pile every time, since it rested on my hot arm as I melted away in the heat. I would have loved to see the face of the poor guy who got his Maxim magazine with a gallon of my perspiration all over it.

Even though I was out and about all day, it's tough not to feel alone when you're a casual mailman. I saw people everywhere, but I could never stop to have a conversation. I drove around aimlessly on the side streets of Springfield; in neighborhoods I'm not from, looking for random side streets to start my routes. Sure, they gave me a map of the route, but how do you get TO the route? It was a constant problem. Once I found my route, the crap really started. You know that myth that dogs hate mailmen? THEY DO. As soon as any brother in a blue hat with an eagle on it walks into a yard, its game time. Customers do cool things like chain dogs to mailbox poles too. Yeah that's right, chain the dog TO the mailbox, not AWAY from it, the way any normal, sane person would. It was actually a diesel-big pit bull named Brutus, but the specifics aren't important. Brutus isn't friendly when people walk into his yard. Brutus thought my arm looked like steak. I didn't go near Brutus, and the mail went back in my bag.

There were many other random problems I had. The windows didn't go down on one of the trucks on a 100-degree day, leaving me in a puddle of sweat. The scanners for the collection boxes stunk, the homes in the ghetto stunk, and I wanted to cry every time the mail slipped out of my slippery arms and scattered wildly across hot asphalt.

Once I kissed fenders with the Cavalier, my fate was sealed. "Dan, you're not going to be able to drive a truck anymore, so you're not going to be able to carry mail for us anymore. We may have a job for you as a clerk or as a mail sorter. We'll try to get back to you as soon as we can," my boss told me.

I sure as heck didn't take the news hard. With the mail truck crashed and impending termination imminent, my moody spirits brightened considerably. Why didn't I just quit? I'm way too proud to turn down twelve dollars an hour, and once I bragged about it (like I definitely did way too much), I was screwed. How the heck was I suppose to walk away from a job that I bragged about all spring? My ego would have gotten in the way.

So what's the lesson in all of this? Things fix themselves. My great big embarrassing accident didn't embarrass me at all, not even initially. There was obviously a problem when I looked at the side panel on the truck after pulling to the side of the road, knowing that I would probably lose my job, and all I felt was relief. I fell back on my grocery store job, with its low wages, long hours, and hey – good times. I am still a kid at heart, so why not?

Keeping up appearances: UMass needs to make the move

SHAWN ILLINITCH

On August 21, the Princeton Review released its "New Best 331 Colleges," a list that ranks schools on a variety of subjects. The list is targeted at students searching for a school, whether a freshman or a transfer. The University of Massachusetts ranked in the top 20 in three categories, including Long Lines and Red Tape and Campus is Tiny, Unsightly or Both.

UMass came in at No. 20 in the latter category. Evidently, the new Fine Arts Center is not as pretty as the University had hoped. The unpaved and pot-holed yellow lots haven't done much for our school in this category either. The top school in the category is the State University of New York at Stonybrook. The number one school for a beautiful campus is our neighbor, Mount Holyoke College.

UMass takes the top spot in the Long Lines and Red Tape category. If you are reading this, it shouldn't come as a surprise. If you are an entering freshman or transfer, I'm sure you have enjoyed the process of paying a bill. Trying to call the Bursar's Office, you should not be surprised to find the phone busy for an hour or more.

> "The University is a big business, and as such it has to take steps to attract customers. If the big business, in this case the University, fails to attract new customers, it fails."

The rankings are not what are important here, though. Instead of looking at rankings, the University should ask itself what it is doing to improve on these rankings. One would think that spending an additional $2.5 million this year on Peoplesoft would help the University to improve on these rankings, but that won't be the case.

Peoplesoft will eventually integrate the human resource and finance systems here at the University. This will allow databases to easily communicate with each other.

There are many things, however, that Peoplesoft will not do.

Peoplesoft will not give us more money to hire a larger janitorial staff to clean the University and improve on those things that have helped to drag the appearance down.

Peoplesoft will not give us more money to hire more staff so that someone trying to call the Bursar's Office will get a busy signal or an unanswered phone for two straight hours.

Maybe the University is taking steps to reduce lines around campus. Maybe the new U-Stores will have shorter lines. I don't think so, but the possibility is always there.

The University is a big business, and as such it has to take steps to attract customers. If the big business, in this case the University, fails to attract new customers, it fails. It goes out of business. Even if it has the best systems in the world, no customers means no revenues.

As our campus becomes more run down and people are forced to stand in long lines for hours, the perception of the University goes down. The school becomes that crappy state school that "not so smart" kids go to. It becomes the second or third choice.

It's a shame, because UMass is a better school than that. Those in the right positions should work to improve its image.

By the way, UMass was ranked twelfth in the category Where the Newspaper Gets Read. You can help to improve that category. Look around and pass this paper on to someone who looks bored waiting for lecture to start.

Ford wants to be bad... ...and is, Moore matures

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

MANDY MOORE
Mandy Moore
Epic

WILLA FORD
Willa Was Here
Lava/Atlantic

Mandy Moore is one of the busiest teen stars today. She works on MTV hosting Mandy, focusing on music and entertainment and she occasionally plays guest host when Carson Daly is absent on Total Request Live. She also had a role in Garry Marshall's motion picture The Princess Diaries, which came out this summer. In addition, the 17-year-old is the spokesperson for Neutrogena, pitching television commercials and print ad campaigns.

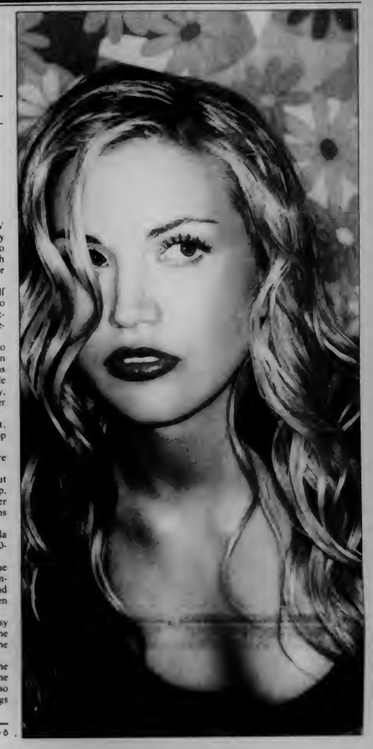
But her work ethic doesn't necessarily mean she has differentiated herself from her rivals or that it has brought her bountiful success. Her first two albums So Real and I Wanna Be With You didn't have huge commercial success, selling close to 3 million copies. And her first single "Candy" had bubblegum pop (pun intended!) written all over it.

The new album's debut single "In My Pocket," co-produced by Emilio Estefan Jr., has a Middle Eastern influence with a rich sound. But with an avant-garde turn, her fans apparently weren't ready for the abrupt change as the song under performed expectations. "One Sided Love," another Middle Eastern tinged tune, is wonderfully written and composed. With a breathy, Natalie Imbruglia vibe Moore spares us the vocal gyrations of some of her equals.

Despite being another love song "Cry" features a live string quartet, acoustic guitars, and a beautiful melody. "You Remind Me" is a lean, hip-hop spiked jam that reinstates Moore's faith in love.

"Saturate Me" is one of the low points on Mandy Moore. The lyrics are throwaway, her voice is barely audible, and the music has no zing.

Mandy Moore isn't a groundbreaking album nor lyrically perfect, but Moore does convince us that she's not about walking around in a tube top, miniskirt, and heels; she actually seems to care about her music. But her longevity seems to be put into question. She's already released three albums probably hoping to enjoy her current success before her fame disappears.



Breathing down her neck is a new teen pop starlet. Her name's Amanda Williford (better known as Willa Ford). She's blond. She's seductive. She's 20-years-old. Yep, another Britney wannabe!

Even before her first single hit the airwaves, Ford was already famous due to her two-year relationship to Backstreet Boy Nick Carter. But the relationship drew more hate than love for the fledgling songbird. The buxom blond apparently inspired enough venom among his fans to foster some four-dozen anti-Willa Web sites.

The debut single "'I Wanna Be Bad" is dance/pop to the core, with a cutesy sing-along chorus. But the song stops short of accomplishing its mission; the nastiest she gets is proclaiming "losing all my cool/ I'm about to break the rules/ I wanna be bad."

"Prince Charming" is one of the few decent tracks on Willa Was Here. The up-tempo track is dance-floor pop at it's best as she sings "fairy tales can come true/ so I will wait for you" to a future lover. "Dare," another fast track, also shines as the chorus bumps, bangs, and knocks as she aggressively sings "nasty, nasty, nasty!"

MTV celebrates 20 years of pop culture dominance

New book goes behind the scenes of music TV

MTV: UNCENSORED
Edited by Jacob Hoye
Compiled by David P. Levin and Stuart Cohn
Pocket Books

On August 1, 1981, one of the largest cultural phenomena in pop culture was born: MTV. The network's twenty years of establishment have produced some of the greatest moments in rock n' roll history.

MTV and Pocket Books commemorate this pop culture milestone with the publication MTV: Uncensored, a stunning full-color book filled with never-before-told stories and rarely-seen photos from world famous photographers like David LaChapelle, Mark Seliger and Frank Micelotta.

MTV: Uncensored serves as an oral history of the network's illustrious 20 years, filled with anecdotes, stories, and behind-the-scenes revelations from the people who experienced it, including the stars, producers, and production assistants. Contributors to the book include such unmistakable stars as Britney Spears, Jon Stewart, Steven Tyler, Marilyn Manson, and Snoop Dogg.

Former and current MTV VIs and news department honchos, however, offer the most riveting stories behind the success of the world's biggest music and youth culture machine. Just like the network it's covering, the book starts off at a refreshingly creative pace. An uproarious "interview" conducted by the brilliant Chris Connelly (a true pioneer of entertainment journalism) with the M (as in MTV) is one of the highlights in MTV: Uncensored.

The book never forgets MTV's roots, as anyone who has stamped their imprint on MTV over the last 20 years is featured in the book. Groundbreaking shows such as "Yo! MTV Raps" and "Spring Break," plus the "Choose or Lose" pro-social campaign, which urged young people to become politically aware and active, have their own spread in the book. But most importantly, the book shows that MTV's experimentation (which still exists) in creativity offered a great growth spurt for not only the network itself but for television in general.

Written and designed in conjunction with MTV's programming department and award-winning creative team, this 288-pager relives the best of the last 20 years and reveals stories and images never seen in print nor on the air.

MTV: Uncensored serves as a yearbook to MTV's first 20 years. Madonna's memorable performance of "Vogue" at the 1990 Video Music Awards (along with countless other MTV VMA shots), the network's signature moon man planting the MTV flag, are both captured in this book along with many other beautifully shot pictures. One of the biggest photo shoots in MTV's history is also captured in this colorful hardcover book: a David LaChappelle "TRL" class photo, for which everyone from 'N Sync to Fred Durst to Lenny Kravitz to Jennifer Lopez all gathered under one roof.

But it's the behind-the-scenes work in the photo, which was exclusively printed, that was truly an eye-popper. MTV VJ Ananda Lewis, who was on the scene for the shoot, snipped: "I really like Christina and I don't like what's happened to her now that her career has blown up. I met her before that and she seemed so humble and down to earth. I just thought she would keep that." As Lewis went on to note that Aguilera was one of the last stars to walk onto the shoot she explained, "She scans the crowd to see where she wants to sit and Britney's [Spears] right here lying down and Christina went "Uh-uh," shaking her head, and walks to the other side."

Other juicy tidbits include the 1995 MTV VMA's where the news department wrangled the difficult-to-interview Madonna for a post-show chatfest. Courtney Love interrupted the interview throwing compacts and makeup at Madonna (all on live TV). Then-MTV newswoman Tabitha Soren, who was on the scene along with Loder interviewing the Queen of Pop, relives the experience: "Madonna was totally trying to be graceful. But her publicist was going 'Cut! Cut! Cut! Get her out of there! Get Madonna out of there! I don't even want her in the same shot as this train wreck."

Wonder why everyone refers to Michael Jackson as the "self-proclaimed King of Pop?" Look no further than MTV newsman Kurt Loder. Apparently Jackson had sent out a release where the press had to refer to him as the "King of Pop." Loder found that "this was just really offensive." Loder coined the phrase during one of his news segments and has since become an international practice.

The book has just enough dirt on the stars without going overboard and making it seem like a tawdry tabloid. Its compelling humor moves the book along at a rip-roaring pace. "[You haven't lived until you've] watched a puzzled audio tech wondering where, exactly, to attach a lavaliere microphone to a barely clothed Lil' Kim. (Clip it on a nipple? Nail it to her head?)," Loder quips.

MTV: Uncensored is an indispensable book for any pop-culture junkie. It offers insight by those who mattered into the proliferation of MTV and it's rich history in pop culture. It eschews the superficial and fake and tells the stories as they were meant to be told-candidly and without remorse.

MTV has legacy on television and beyond

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

As a teenager, it's hard to imagine a world without MTV—a world barren of pop icons, visually imaginative videos, game shows, after school programs, steamy nighttime soaps and bawdy awards shows. Before August 1, 1981 the world was just that, absent of the sexually charged network. But since MTV's inception, pop culture hasn't been the same.

At a time when the Big Three networks still ruled the airwaves (not to mention the fact that cable was a luxury found in only in a handful of homes), Music Television was balked at by record companies, advertisers, and cable operators.

Twenty years and thousands of videos later, MTV is a mothership directing nearly every move in pop-culture. It has spun off sister channels VH1 and MTV2 and left other cable channels in the veritable ratings dust. Broadcast to 79 million homes in the U.S. and 271 million elsewhere, MTV is now seen in 140 countries-roughly 70 percent of the world. As a sideline, the network produces feature films (including such hits as Beavis and Butt-head Do America and Save the Last Dance). Its empire generates reported annual revenues of $3 billion.

But MTV is more than a corporate powerhouse. It jumpstarts careers and dictates nearly every pop-culture trend. Its children range from Madonna (the undisputed queen of MTV) to Britney Spears (a teen goddess for the new millennium). With 1988's "Yo! MTV Raps," it brought hip-hop into the mainstream; with 1992's "The Real World," it laid the groundwork for reality television. Such disparate figures as Adam Sandler and Bill Clinton have boosted their careers by appearing on the network.

Of course, MTV has changed the way we experience music and the way musicians compose it: A pop song is now something to be viewed as well as listened to. And as MTV's popularity was on the rise, stars realized they needed their MTV. The artists who had a visionary eye for their music created quick-cut eye candy for audiences. Sales of Michael Jackson's hit Thriller exploded after the video of the same name (whom critics still rank as the best video of all time) began airing. MTV's ratings went through the roof.

By the mid-80's, as hordes of competitors wooed MTV's young audience, the network reinvented itself. The anchor in 1987 was the pop-trivia show "Remote Control." The show heralded more television series for the network, with videos a diminishing presence. They aren't even shown in full on the hit request show "Total Request Live," MTV's current franchise.

A select few of MTV's biggest stars not only helped the channel become popular and changed pop music forever, but also helped break down walls of gender, race, and sexuality. Videos by gender-bender Boy George, Michael Jackson (the first African-American presence on the channel), gay icon George Michael, and sexual provocateur Madonna broke down stereotypical barriers that helped change society forever.

The average age of the MTV viewer has, and will remain, a few months shy of 21. Back in the beginning the network had to decide whether MTV was going to grow old with the audience. Of course, the network decided not to. It's importance then will remain as grand as it ever has. The only thing, then, that will grow is MTV's relevance as a pop-culture monolith.

By Jake Lewis
Collegian Staff

RAT RACE
Directed by Jerry Zucker
Starring Cuba Gooding Jr., John Lovitz and Rowan Atkinson
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

I read somewhere, rather recently, that comedic films only succeed when the director knows what is funny and what isn't. Granted, several Hollywood honchos think that they know what will work, but more often than not, they couldn't be more off-target. What's the Worst That Could Happen?

Therefore, it comes as a great relief that one-third of the comically gifted Z.A.Z. trio (Zucker, Abrahams, Zucker), the Farrelly Brothers of the 1980's who gave us The Naked Gun and Airplane! spoofs, has returned to his roots to present us with the madcap Rat Race. Jerry Zucker has adorned his first comedy in years with a bevy of talented actors, especially in the field of comedy.

Heading off the cast is Monty Python's John Cleese, sporting a mouth full of fake teeth, as the eccentric owner of a Las Vegas casino. He wrangles eight vacationers to take part in a challenge that could be the basis for a TV reality show (it probably is, for all I know). He and his associate Grisham (Dave Thomas) have planted two million dollars in a locker at the Santa Fe, New Mexico bus station. Whoever gets there first keeps the money.

The contestants, in no particular order, are the long-lost, newly reunited, mother-daughter team of Vera and Merrel (Whoopi Goldberg in a ferociously ugly blonde wig, and Lanei Chapman, respectively). Their plot really doesn't go anywhere, but they share a mildly amusing scene with a squirrel vendor, then later when they are mistaken for special-needs children. Soon, you forget that the two women only met a day before, instead thinking they've known each other their whole lives. This suits just fine, since the purpose of Rat Race is to offer a no-strings comedy, not a sentimental mother-daughter on the road film.

Every movie must have some sort of romance, and here it's between the underrated Breckin Meyer (who I thought was the best part of Clueless), and Amy Smart. As these two seek out the cash, they also establish a small romance, but not before nose-diving a helicopter into Smart's cheating boyfriend's pool. I applaud Meyer for attempting to get further away from the rapidly decaying "teen screen" genre, and trying more mature projects, although we'll wait to see his real acting chops in the new ABC network TV show "Inside Schwartz."

Similarly, the likeable Seth Green plays brother to newcomer Vince Vieluf, as the two money-hungry small-time crooks pursue the prize money. The film's only gross-out moment comes when Vieluf, who talks with a speech impediment, shows the cause of why he talks as such. We get a brief, yet disturbingly clear shot of an infected tongue which he has just had pierced. After awhile his mumblings grate the nerves, but the team shares an oddball scene with a cow's udders.

The laughs come full on with the inclusion of a subplot with Cuba Gooding, Jr. He's a much-hated NFL referee (he made a bad call in a big game) he is pretty much already an wit's end when the film begins. He slowly starts to unravel as each new obstacle presents itself in the race and it's downright hilarious. When he hijacks a tour bus of Lucille Ball impersonators, you can almost see that last ounce of sanity vanish. Never since his Oscar winning role in Jerry Maguire has Gooding be so, well, good. He's on the ball, and dominates the screen when it's his time.

Equally as ludicrous and delightful is the sheer annoyance of John Lovitz's character. Dragging along his nagging wife (Kathy Najimy) and two boring kids, he has one of the funniest scenes in the film, when he steals a certain dictator of Germany's car and then rides through a World War II Veterans Parade with a trimmed mustache on. It sounds too cliché and predictable for this event to happen, but it'll bring tears to your eyes because you laugh so hard at the lunacy of the whole thing.

Finally, speaking of lunacy, there's Rowan Atkinson, better known as Mr. Bean, who plays a peculiar Italian, suffering from bouts of narcolepsy. What's so funny about him is how he manages to maintain his Beanhood with his rubber face and outlandish interactions he encounters, like when he plays fetch with a human heart.

For all those, like me, who are sick of the gross-out films of recent years, and yearn for good, old-fashioned funny, then Rat Race is right up your alley. I can assure you now that whomever you want to win the money doesn't. And that's no problem with anyone, because by then you have been the ultimate winner, getting a clean comedy that is truly funny.

Staind blaze through emotional hits, Cold goes goth, Adema disappoints

STAIND with COLD and ADEMA
Hartford Expo Center
July 13

Friday the thirteenth. Dusk upon us. What could possibly make this scene complete? Try a roaring performance by one of the best hard rock bands in America today, Staind.

Staind left little to be desired in their July 13 performance at the Expo Center in Hartford. Utilizing tracks from all three of their albums, the Western Massachusetts local heroes kept an enthusiastic crowd at fever pitch during a fifteen song set that stretched well into the 90-minute range.

The set was nearly flawless in terms of musicianship—Staind is not one of those bands that sound completely different live than they do on the album. People went expecting one thing, and they got it—and outstanding performance by an outstanding rock band. Frontman Aaron Lewis showed his vocal range, easily shifting between haunting, sad melodies to snarling roars without missing a beat.

This is not to understate the work of the rest of the band—guitarist Mike Mushok, bassist Johnny April, and drummer Jon Wysocki set the pace and tone of the show with their outstanding musicianship. Mushok and April also had to overcome minor technical difficulties with power, smoothing them over to the point where many in the crowd didn't even notice.

The band hit early and hit hard during their set, opening with the staple "Mudshovel" before moving into sevetal tunes from their most recent and best selling disc, Break the Cycle. Searing versions of "Open Your Eyes," "Pressure," "Fade," "Can't Believe," "Suffer," and "For You," were all hits with the crowd, and instantly recognizable to nearly all in attendance. Mixed in, Staind dived into their previous album, the breakthrough Dysfunction to roar through heavy hitters like "Just Go," "Suffocate," "Raw," and "Crawl." They also pulled out the tune "Break" from their first album, Tormented.

Obviously, out of obligation more than anything else, Staind played "It's Been Awhile," and "Outside," their most recent radio hits. Realistically they were probably the two weakest songs that they performed on the night. For "It's Been Awhile," the band had to calm down a raucous crowd for the obvious sing-a-long. Staind then cleared the stage, leaving Lewis alone on the stage to play the obligatory "Outside." While the band could have played the studio version, Lewis went it alone, strumming through an acoustic version while the crowd caught its breath, waiting for the band to crank it back up again.

Thankfully they did, closing with "Spleen," of all songs. A loud, angry song from the end of Dysfunction, it left the crowd both thrilled and exhausted. Not exactly a nice happy ending, but it was a joy to experience.

Cold was the middle act of the night, opening with a solid set of songs primarily from their newest album, 13 Ways to Bleed Onstage. As good as their performance was, it was as equally weird. The lighting, the entrance, the spider logo — Cold has all but become a goth band. Highlights of their set included "End of the World," the raucous and riffy "Just Got Wicked," and, of course, "Send in the Clowns." During "Clowns" the crowd roared with delight at their first Staind sighting of the evening. Aaron Lewis came out as a special guest for a piece of the song, roaring into the mike at the climax of the song. Then he walked off, with less than 15 seconds of vocal time, without any emotion. That's showmanship at its finest.

The opening band of the evening, on the other hand, was not. Young guns Adema played a twenty-five minute set of rap-metal from their upcoming album. Their songs "Skin" and "Freaking Out" highlighted a loud but relatively weak set that above all, lacked polish. Adema's studio debut album has since shown promise, but their live set has a long way to go.

On "Tired" Willa expresses abhorrence at critics who lump her into the manufactured teen pop heap. Ironically, the song has teen pop written all over it, canceling out any reason that we should classify her otherwise. The schmaltzy ballad "Tender" displays Willa at her worst—her voice works best when the speed is turned up with dance-pop beats.

It's funny how Ford writes "Here's to the next record, may my life be as much of an emotional rollercoaster as it was during this one so I can keep writing real lyrics and not the cheesy sh-t about butterflies, sunshine and candy." Memo to Ford: Hate it to break it to ya babe, but there are no real lyrics on your record. Oh, and one more thing, on the next record try being good for a change.

The (not so) fine art of remixes

By Rob Schulze
Collegian Staff

RAZED IN BLACK
oh my goth!
Cleopatra

SWITCHBLADE SYMPHONY
Sinister Nostalgia
Cleopatra

There's a case to be made both for and against remixing songs. You have to walk a fine line – people aren't in the habit of redoing songs that they don't like, so you're screwing around with something that means something both to you and to others. This isn't a cover song, either – the original song, by the original performer, is in your hands – it's like cutting up a painting and pasting it together in a way that pleases you a little more. On the other hand, who doesn't want to remake their old favorites in their own image? The results can be fun (like the myriad techno/ska/rock renditions of the Super Mario Bros. song) or interesting, but more often they are either poor or, perhaps worse, simply irrelevant.

Two new remix releases from Cleopatra (the most remix-happy label in the known universe) highlight all these pros and cons. Razed in Black's oh my goth! EP and Switchblade Symphony's Sinister Nostalgia prove in different ways how remixing is a device that doesn't yield as great a result as many seem to think.

oh my goth! consists of not one, or two, or even three, but six (yes: six) versions of the title track plus six remixes of older songs from the RIB catalog. The touched-up older songs fall firmly into the "irrelevant" category. RIB's guitar-and-techno sound doesn't benefit or suffer by the adding of another low-end beat in the foreground or distorting the vocals a bit. They sound a little different, but not enough to matter either way. Sticking a cool-sounding name on something (like the "Hard Mix" of "Master") doesn't change a song in the least.

The different versions of "oh my goth!" have more going for them. The original (long an underground favorite, this is its first official release) is a fun homage to rough sex with a good beat, loud guitars, and some really sexy female moaning at various points. Rommell Regulacion (the one-man band who is Razed in Black) does a good job with the singing/screaming vocals, all and all adding up to a good piece of fluff industrial pop.

The two main remixes of it (the other three on the album are extended versions of these two, if you follow me) are also worthwhile. My personal favorite is the DJ Reis-B Trance Remix. Adding cascading keyboards, cutting out entirely the heavy creaming parts, and putting more of an emphasis on the female backing vocals (both the regular and the, uh, erotic ones), the version is more relaxed, longer, and different enough from the typical RIB sound to feel like you're hearing a different tune. The DJ Scooby's Nubreaks Virus Mix is just the opposite, focusing more on the loudness and honing in on the rough edges of "oh my goth!" Not quite as spectacular, but still good.

Three good songs on an EP containing 12 is not what I'd call a great bargain. Switchblade Symphony's posthumous remix CD, Sinister Nostalgia, has a few more success stories, but (just going to show what a touchy business this remix stuff is) for totally opposite reasons.

To understand why so much of Sinister Nostalgia fails, you have to know just why Switchblade Symphony got popular in the first place. The innate appeal of the band lay in that they were so different from all the other music out there. Their darkwave sound was so sparse, minimalist, and downright creepy compared with all the thump-a-second rave club trash out there that it was like hearing a whole new genre of music taking for right between your eyes.

The whole point of Switchblade Symphony was that they didn't sound like Apoptygma Berzerk... and so, of course, the first song on Sinister Nostalgia is "Sweet – Apoptygma Berzerk Mix." Sigh.

And so it goes. Sure enough, Apoptygma Berzerk, Meegs from Coal Chamber, Gam Eternal, and others unite to speed up, techno-icise, metal out or otherwise maim these classic songs so that they lose the appeal that they had in the first place. Not that they're bad in their own right – I mean, APB is fantastic – but they just don't do any justice to the originals, and for that reason shouldn't have been done in the first place.

Where the remixes succeed is where the remixer has the patience to stick with the original atmosphere and play with it to fit his own vision of what it could be. Keith Hillebrandt's mix of "Dissolve," for instance, almost shimmers with slowness and atmosphere, with the emphasis squarely on the haunting vocals that made the song good in the first place. Temple of Rain's "Witches" remix achieves the same thing – they play with the vocals a bit, focus the music more on some effects than the original did, but still the flavor, the specialness of the original is in some way preserved.

Remixing is risky business and, as these two albums prove, provides for more disappointments than success stories. When they work, they work, but the best advice on alternate versions still remains the same: you'd be better off buying the originals.

Terriers the target

Men's soccer looks to rebound on home turf

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

In its first three games, the Massachusetts men's soccer team (1-2) showed great potential for a stellar season. However, things have not gone as planned for the Minutemen.

With a quiet confidence the extremely talented Minutemen traveled to West Hartford, Conn. on Wednesday to face off with the University of Hartford. Just three days earlier, the boys from Amherst manhandled Atlantic Coast Conference powerhouse North Carolina State, 2-1, in the Adidas Wolf pack Classic, which is held on the NC State campus in Raleigh, NC.

The result was quite different against the Hawks of Hartford as the score was swapped and UMass lost 2-1 in a tightly played match.

Not only was the loss hard to swallow, but to add insult to injury in the 76th minute of the match senior co-captain and possibly the best sweeper in the Atlantic 10, J.R. Pouncey, went down with what appeared to be a groin pull.

But according to head coach Sam Koch, Pouncey's status for the next couple of games is "looking good." The Minutemen get a chance to redeem their loss and bring their record back up to .500 when they play in their home opener at Totman Field on Sunday against intra-state rival Boston University.

The match is very important for the Minutemen. For starters, the UMass student body will get its first look at the squad and, in order to fill the bleachers for every home game, the Minutemen will have to show a solid performance.

Secondly, next weekend is the UMass Classic. The Maroon and White would want nothing more than to go into its own tournament coming off a victory.

The biggest problem that the Minutemen have had in their first three games is that they have been out-shot in all three contests. Behind the stellar play of goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn, the defense has held up the ship. The senior co-captain has given up only six goals on 48 shots.

The offense will need to be more aggressive, and coach Koch put it best when he said, "they just need to shoot more.

"It is an easy correction and it will be made on Sunday."

At the time of the interview Koch was practically out the door on his way to Storrs, Conn. to watch BU face off with UMass-rival UConn. Chances are high that he will be seeing good things.

The Terriers have had a great start to the season. Over the Labor Day weekend, BU participated in the Lehigh Nike Soccer Classic in Bethlehem, Pa. and exited the Liberty state with two impressive victories.

In the opener they blanked Army in a tight match, 1-0. The Terriers followed up the tough victory with an impressive performance against the home team, Lehigh. A complete BU domination over the Mountain Hawks led to a 4-1 victory for the Terriers.

Coach Koch wants to see a complete match from his players where everyone plays well on both sides of the field. If all goes as planned, the Maroon and White can turn around the inauspicious start to the season and allow the UMass students to enjoy the home opener.

(U-WIRE) CARBONDALE, Ill. – Few people expect collegiate athletes to harm their bodies by using social drugs, but according to a recent NCAA survey of student-athlete drug use, smoking cigarettes is a daily occurrence for some athletes.

Of the student-athletes surveyed, 22 percent of athletes had smoked in the last year and of the 11 percent who said they were still smoking, 26 percent said they smoke on a daily basis.

Although this is the first year the NCAA surveyed athletes about cigarette use, the survey has examined other social drug use in past years. It found that smokeless tobacco consumption declined from 22.5 percent in 1997 to 17.4 percent this year.

Although this habit decreased with athletes, SIU baseball head coach Dan Callahan still thinks smokeless tobacco is a problem that is "way too common in baseball."

The University's athletic trainers do speak to student-athletes about wellness such as nutrition and drug and alcohol abuse, but they do not directly focus on educating athletes about smoking.

The trainers think the athletes should be conscientious of their health, and not using social drugs is one way to keep their athletic performance up.

"As an athlete, hopefully they take care of their bodies," said Brenda McVinua, assistant athletic trainer.

But the athletic trainers can only educate student-athletes about the dangers of smoking, and can't supervise them all the time.

"It's not illegal. There's nothing we can do about it," McVinua said.

University and NCAA rules do not penalize an athlete for smoking, but there are consequences that affect performance.

Smoking makes it harder to breathe, something that is obviously important while in training or at a competition. It also keeps oxygen from the muscles, making an athlete weaker. A smoker's blood vessels narrow, which makes the heart work harder. Smokers also have less endurance, shortness of breath – three times more than non-smokers – and two times as much mucus as non-smokers.

Smokers are also more prone to colds and asthma attacks than non-smokers.

"You don't heal as well when you smoke," McVinua said.

The trainers do not ask if an athlete smokes unless he or she is sick more than the average athlete. The athletic and training departments at the University do not survey athletes as to their use of recreational drugs and cigarettes.

Callahan does not know of any athletes currently on his team that smoke, but he said if a member of his team was a smoker, he would try to educate him on the dangers of the habit.

The SIU Athletic Department follows NCAA rules on tobacco use, which do not allow athletes to use tobacco products during practice or games. An athlete can be kicked out of the practice or competition, or could lead to a suspension, for the use of tobacco products.

"We're not going to allow it here, we're not going to allow it on the bus, or prior to a game," Callahan said.

NCAA Football 2002 a big hit

By Steve Iaccarino
The Heights (Boston College)

(U-WIRE) CHESTNUT HILL, Mass. – Well, Superfans, the wait is over – there now exists a video game that does college football justice. EA Sports' NCAA Football 2002 for PlayStation2 is everything college football fanatics have been waiting for. Amazing graphics, every major college team represented and sweet college-style playbooks make this game a very realistic and enjoyable gaming experience.

The game has the same modes of play as most football video games: exhibition, season and practice.

NCAA Football 2002 also has a Dynasty mode which die-hard college football fans will be drooling over for a long time to come. In Dynasty mode, the player is asked to take on the role as the head coach of any of the 117 Division I-A football teams or the 27 Division I-AA football teams and create a string of winning seasons. The player will have to face season- or career-ending injuries to his players, graduating seniors or underclassmen leaving early for the NFL draft and the challenge of recruiting new players.

At the end of each season, the player will have to undergo a recruiting process with simulated high school stars. This will entail high school visits, scholarship awards and big time decisions. At which position will depth be most necessary? Is the top-rated high school quarterback worth sacrificing chances for other players? This should more than satisfy some of the hard-core college football fans out there who burn through ordinary football games in days.

If, in fact, there is desire to go further than just the Dynasty mode of NCAA Football 2002, that opportunity exists as well. EA Sports has devised a crossover system with Madden 2002 that will allow players to export a graduating class from NCAA Football to Madden. In this sense, if one were playing Madden on franchise mode, the new draft class would not be simulated, but would instead represent the draft class from NCAA Football 2002. This can be done any number of times, making each game complement the other in an unprecedented fashion. It will also allow Superfans to make sure a few Eagles make it to the NFL.

EA Sports has also added an extensive stat-tracking process that allows users to follow virtually every stat over the course of a season, or even a Dynasty. Records are also kept for Heisman Trophy standings, AP and BCS rankings, as well as other awards such as Player of the Week. The game also features previous college football records, like single season rushing and passing records. In this way, true die-hards will be able to see if William Green can break Barry Sanders' mark of 2,628 single-season rushing yards.

Gameplay is very similar to Madden 2001, which should make the transition fairly easy. A big change, however, is the addition of option plays in the coach's playbooks, which makes pitching the ball much more of a factor.

This addition could cause some initial confusion, as most video games are not created with that kind of on-the-fly decision making. After a few tries, however, running the option becomes fairly easy.

One big improvement in gameplay is the decrease in the amount of one-handed catches. In Madden 2001 this was a huge problem, at least for the defenses. Many of the one-handed catches have been exchanged for more realistic two-handed grabs.

Another nice improvement is that the system reacts to the gamer's play-calling on both the offensive and defensive sides of the ball. So that if players constantly run sweeps to the outside, they should expect an outside linebacker blitz, or if they run long routes with the receivers, expect to see dime coverage with the main wide outs under double coverage.

Once again, as in Madden 2001, the running game is virtually perfect. The offensive line creates holes most of the time that can be seen and taken advantage of, and the control of the running backs is amazing. Most PlayStation2 controllers allow for pressure sensitive controls. This means that if a player taps a button lightly, the running back will make a slight juke movement, while a more firm push of the button will create an amazing realistic ball fake which will easily separate a defender from his jock strap.

The graphics are quite stunning and are flaunted in the games' stadium tours. In this way, close-ups of every stadium can be had, under almost every weather condition, at any time of day.

Another great aspect of the graphics is the tremendous attention to detail put into making the players look realistic. If a player gets thrown to the ground a few times, expect to see grass stains on his pants. After some close plays or touchdowns, the screen will switch to the school's mascot dancing or cringing, depending on the scenario. Plays that run too close to the sideline will sometimes result in the ever-satisfying collision with the line crew — something any football fan will attest is one of the coolest parts of the game.

The sound in NCAA Football 2002 is fairly standard; commentary makes up most of the sound during the game. The commentators do a good job of keeping the game interesting, but their catch-phrases tend to get old after awhile.

PREDICTION: UNPREDICTABLE

The National Football League begins its 2001-2002 season this weekend

For all you football fanatics, pigskin purists and ones who forgot how to stay conscious on Sunday afternoons, revive yourself. The NFL season starts this weekend.

Over the years, so-called football experts have foreseen who would end up holding the Vince Lombardi Trophy by the end of the season. Thankfully, we aren't those experts and after the last two seasons, there is no reason to predict who will be in the Super Bowl, because quite frankly, who thought that the last two Super Bowl champions would be a team with no defense (St. Louis Rams) and a team with no offense (Baltimore Ravens).

However, with the first weekend of real football on the horizon we, David Rose and Matthew F. Sacco are forced to throw our fearless predictions into the realm of public skepticism. May god help us all.

David Rose's Picks

AFC East
Indianapolis – Edgerrin James's Dreads will have 6 interceptions this season
NY Jets – Get your own stadium, you freeloaders.
Miami- QB Cade McNown mouths off, becomes defense's tackling dummy.
Buffalo – Rob Johnson misses six weeks after he gives himself a severe concussion by blowing his nose.

New England – Where's Terry Glenn? Chillin' with Jimmy Williams.

AFC Central
Tennessee – The best team in the league, now that kicker Al Del Greco is out.
Baltimore – Falls victim to "The Curse of Trent Dilfer."
Jacksonville – Falls victim to "The Curse of Trent Dilfer."
Pittsburgh – Falls victim to "The Curse of Trent Dilfer."
Cincinnati – They don't need a curse, they're already that bad.
Cleveland – See Cincinnati.

AFC West
Oakland – Jerry Rice, what a traitor.
Denver – Leon Lett playing in the snow, don't you see another blooper out of all of this?
Kansas City – Dick Vermeil's tears get on the footballs. Chiefs lead league in fumbles.
San Diego – LaDanian Tomlinson carries Doug Flutie in his helmet. Flutie breaks record for rushing touchdowns.
Seattle – Sorry Seattle, Ichiro can't play for the Seahawks.

NFC East
Philadelphia – As long as the Veterans Stadium Turf doesn't cause 15 torn knee ligaments during the season.
NY Giants – Danny Almonte throws for 30 touchdowns after disclosing that he is 22 years old.
Washington – "The Dan" sees his team flushed down "The Toilet."
Arizona – Way to go Marcel Shipp, gaining a roster spot. Sorry it was with this team.
Dallas – At least there are still the Cowboy cheerleaders to gawk at.

NFC Central
Minnesota – Stringer's death inspires Vikings to a remarkable season.
Tampa Bay – No Super Bowl = Dungy's firing.
Green Bay – I just hate this team.
Detroit – Barry Sanders destroys franchise by doing more of those stupid Coors Commercials.
Chicago – At least they will have fewer losses than the Bulls this season.

NFC West
St. Louis – Their defense can't be worse than last year.
New Orleans – Mardi Gras. I need to be in this city.
San Francisco – Hopefully they won't play at night. All those stars in the sky will make Terrell Owens a non-factor.
Atlanta – Guarantee: Michael Vick will be playing by week three.
Carolina – This team couldn't beat a piñata.

Wild Card Teams – AFC: NY Jets, Baltimore, Denver; NFC: Tampa Bay, Green Bay, New Orleans

AFC Championship – Tennessee over Indianapolis
NFC Championship – Minnesota over St. Louis
Super Bowl – Tennessee over Minnesota

Matthew F. Sacco's Picks

AFC East
Indianapolis – The triplets can score.
Miami – Dartmouth grad Jay Fiedler understands the formula: score enough so pro bowl "D" gets the "W."
New York – They aren't even the best team in the Meadowlands.
Buffalo – Whew! Flutie is gone so Rob Johnson can get complacent and get inefficient.
New England – Last year NE fans called for Bishop, do you really think they'll be calling for Brady?

AFC Central
Tennessee – There are two defenses in the AFC that don't scatter at the sight of Eddie George, one is his own.
Baltimore – The other is the champs.
Jacksonville – A title contender if they stay healthy. Yeah, because that'll happen.
Pittsburgh – With an all pro roster of free agent losses, these guys still manage to compete. Expect nothing less in 2001.
Cincinnati – C'mon, they're the Bungals.

Cleveland – The best fans in football should think about suiting up.

AFC West
Denver – Grease up the M.V.P. trophy, because this Wolverine is locked on.
Oakland – The second best running game in the AFC gets better with Charlie Garner.
Seattle – Their defense is scary, so is Matt Hasselbeck, in Seattle anyway.
Kansas City – Tony Gonzalez – Throw him the damn ball!
San Diego – I know, Doug Flutie just wins games, but the Chargers don't.

NFC East
Philadelphia Eagles – Are you sitting down? Last year McNabb was only about 75% in tune with Andy Reid's offense.
New York – The New York football Giants won't drop 40 points on you, at least that's what Minnesota thought anyway.
Arizona – Waiting for Jake Plummer to become a franchise QB is like going to the DMV.
Washington – If Jell George is so good how come he keeps switching teams?
Dallas – This feels so good for a Giants fan. Wait, this feels good for almost everybody.

NFC Central
Tampa Bay – I'm not going to say it. Johnson & Johnson are smoother than an infant's rear end. Dang I said it.
Minnesota – Robert Griffith is a golden egg on a rotten "D."
Green Bay – Dorsey Levens or Ahman Green. Well, we know there's no controversy at quarterback.
Detroit – Maybe the best receivers in football. Maybe the worst QB to boot. Sorry Dilfer, worst QB with a team.
Chicago – Brian Urlacher is a rising star in a withering franchise.

NFC West
St. Louis – Pro football's version of the fun n' gun offense, but with better players.
New Orleans – We're sure it's not fair to have Brooks and Blake on the same team. We're just not sure for whom.
San Francisco – Owens could be the NFL's best WR if he didn't subscribe to the Keyshawn Johnson "How to be an arrogant juvenile" newsletter.
Atlanta – If this team didn't play on turf they might still have an all pro running back.
Carolina – Weinke won the Heisman. Heupel took the title. Not promising.

Wild Card Teams – AFC: Miami, Baltimore, Oakland; NFC – NY Giants, Minnesota, New Orleans
AFC Championship – Denver over Tennessee
NFC Championship – St. Louis over Tampa Bay
Super Bowl – St. Louis over Denver

– David Rose and Matthew F. Sacco are Collegian columnists.

backward. It was like we hadn't practiced, and that's what was disappointing. We had a simple game plan and didn't execute it. There were always one or two guys making a mistake on every single play. It wouldn't matter who we played. It wouldn't matter if it was Marshall, or William & Mary again, or Amherst Pop Warner. You've got to have 11 guys doing the right thing. And that's not the way they practiced – that is what's really baffling."

If they haven't already, the Minuemen must regain focus now if they plan on making this Saturday's contest look like anything close to a football game. There's no way to tiptoe around the fact that Marshall is the best team the UMass football program has ever scheduled.

The Thundering Herd hasn't had a losing season since 1983 and has won the Motor City Bowl each of the last three years. Before joining I-A football, Marshall won I-AA national championships in 1992 and 1996, and finished second four other times.

The Herd is led by junior quarterback Byron Leftwich who went 27-of-43 for 274 yards with one score in Marshall's 49-14 loss to No. 1 Florida. He can throw, he can run, and at 6-foot-6, he's tall.

"They all feel at Marshall that he is better than Chad Pennington," Whipple said.

Pennington is now on the New York Jets roster.

Leftwich's main target is sophomore wide out Darius Watts. Against Florida, he caught six passes for 116 yards and a touchdown. Watts is a sure first-round draft pick whenever he makes the decision to take the step.

Heading the Herd defense is senior linebacker Max Yates and junior corner Yancey Satterwhite. Yates, the 6-foot-3, 245 pound Butkis award finalist, made nine tackles against the Gators. Satterwhite equaled that mark and added a sack and an interception to the mix.

Overall, Marshall is just a bigger, stronger, faster and better team. That's not too difficult to comprehend.

UMass didn't schedule Marshall with victory in mind. It did so in hopes of putting up a strong fight against a national I-A power. If UMass can do for Whipple what Brown did for him in 1983, then respect will be granted. Keeping it within an embarrassment will do wonders for this team's confidence.

There's no need to reach for a miracle right now.

Look for complete NFL season preview, mid-week... next week.

Minutemen Marshall-ed

Jimmie Howard and the Massachusetts football team must gather the troops and burst into Huntington, W.V. on Saturday in order to keep the contest within reach.

UMass heads to Huntington with high hopes

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

A group of pigskin-adoring Ivy Leaguers treaded upon the greenery of Penn State's Beaver Stadium on Nov. 5, 1983. It came to brave the rule of Joe Paterno and the defending National Champion Nittany Lions.

That confronting crowd was from Brown University, the school with the Division I-AA football program, the same team that deferred to lowly Harvard the previous Saturday.

But Brown only fell to Penn State by 15 points that autumn day, 38-21 – a notable act from such an unsuspecting crew.

Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple, then an assistant in that Bear program, is looking back at his old team's moral victory in hopes of finding some inspiration for this Saturday's game at Division I-A Marshall in Huntington, W.V.

"We (Brown) played worse against Harvard (in 1983) than we (Massachusetts) did Saturday against William & Mary," Whipple said. "The kids went down to Penn State and played their tails off. I didn't think we had a prayer to win. We should have never even played the game. But that's the great thing about sports.

"The bad thing about sports is what I had to go through Saturday."

By all accounts, the Maroon and White collapsed last week at McGuirk Stadium. The offense totaled 141 yards, and the defense gave up 358 yards along with three easy touchdowns to William and Mary's Rich Musinksi.

"Last week I was very disappointed," Whipple said. "I was shocked, quite frankly. I really liked this team, and after the game I would have liked to hit them all in the mouth."

All jesting aside, Whipple's main concern was the Minutemen's offensive execution. First off, he said that the receivers ran many bad routes, which reflected on freshman quarterback Matt Guice's poor throwing performance.

"He's going to go through growing pains," Whipple said. "I think he tried to do a few too many things on his own, but that's just his nature, which is why he's going to be a good player. He wants to make plays. He's a worker and he's a tough kid, so he'll be fine."

Also, not one Minuteman on the offensive side of the ball made a big play Saturday. No big catches or significant runs to talk about. William and Mary completed a 50-plus-yard pass in the first half and a successful option-reverse on an important 3rd and 16 third quarter possession – both were key to the Tribe's 31-10 runaway victory.

"We have to hang our hat on something and improve," Whipple said. "We just took so many steps

Four-way Cage match hits Amherst

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

A stampede will hit the UMass campus this weekend. A stampede of Bulls, Wildcats, and a third, yet-to-be-determined group of Big Green objects. However, the Massachusetts women's volleyball team will be ready to tame the incoming intruders and look to pick up three wins on its own floor.

Buffalo, New Hampshire, and Dartmouth will all be traveling to Amherst this weekend as they and the Minutewomen (2-2) take part in the UMass Invitational at Curry Hicks Cage. The Big Green and Bulls will be somewhat of a mystery to the Maroon and White, but the team should have the Wildcats well scouted. UNH and UMass both participated in the Husky Classic last weekend at UConn, and both squads faced off against the same three teams. All three visiting clubs, however, should provide tough obstacles between the Minutewomen and the three W's.

"This will be Dartmouth's first match, so we don't know a lot about them," head coach Bonnie Kenny said. "But we've always played them each spring, and they've been competitive."

Kenny mentioned the Big Green's Ashley Dean "will probably give [them] fits," Dean, a senior All-Ivy League selection last year, will be a threat on both the offensive and defensive sides of the ball, as she has racked up 364 kills and 405 digs so far in her career.

Buffalo enters this weekend's tournament with a 2-1 record, but so far Kenny has only seen the Bulls' stats on the season. But after seeing UNH play three times last weekend, and even having the same three outcomes as UMass did in ending the tourney with a 1-2 record, Kenny knows of what to expect.

"UNH is going to be a very good team," Kenny said. "We might be a little older, but they're bigger. We'll need to serve the ball tough and take them out of their offense."

The Minutewomen have received their firepower from senior Lauren Vander Veen and sophomore Nitia Small on the offensive end, as both players have racked up many kills per match over the first four outings. Senior Lymarie Llovet has also given the Maroon and White some added punch to the team's attack. On the defensive side of the ball, Llovet has also performed extremely well, averaging 11 digs per match.

The team has also received solid contributions from two newcomers on defense, junior transfer Jitka Stehnova and freshman Michelle Spaleta. Both players have given the Minutewomen added protection on the defensive side, and Stehnova has so far adapted to her role as the team's setter quite adequately, totaling 53 assists in its two wins against Northeastern and Texas Christian.

Kenny hopes that her squad can muster a bit more firepower for the weekend to complement the strong defensive performances the team has shown and is capable of.

"I think we have to have more offensive production," Kenny said. "We can't get stuck in rotations and allow teams to rally off five, six points in a row on their serve."

Furthermore, the Minutewomen should enjoy the home-court advantage for as long as possible during the weekend. After the UMass Invitational, the squad will have its next seven matches on the road, with four at Florida State and then three away matches to open up the Atlantic 10 season.

Kenny hopes this weekend is successful, saying, "who wouldn't want to pick up three wins on their home floor?" But she knows for that to become a reality her team has to perform up to its potential.

"I think we're going to have to play well in all three games, because we're not a dominant enough offensive team to bank on anything."

Fulbright awarded to professor

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

The Fulbright Program has selected a University of Massachusetts professor to spend the spring semester 2002 teaching courses on American popular culture and to study how the youth incorporate popular music into their own Greek traditions.

Associate Professor of English, Nicholas K. Bromell, will teach undergraduate and graduate courses at Aristotle University in Thessalonika, Greece. His courses will focus on the 1960s, a period Bromell calls, "culture in a moment of transition." He has taught similar courses at UMass and is the author of Tomorrow Never Knows: Rock and Psychedelics In the 1960s.

The Fulbright Program is designed as an international educational exchange, and while Bromell will be teaching on the 1960s, his studies will bring him closer to the culture of today: the contrast of tradition and modern society in regard to music.

Greece in the 1960s, Bromell explained, had a military dictatorship that banned music. While the music scene in the United States was expanding and culture was rebelling, the Greeks faced widespread repression that put down an otherwise rich musical history.

"That shows you how important music is to the Greeks," he said. "And how political."

Bromell plans to find as many ways to meet and talk about music with the locals of Thessalonika and the university setting will provide him with a starting point for his research.

"You meet anyone in Greece and it's a huge portal to generations. Once I meet one person I have ways of meeting their extended family," Bromell explained. "I'm assuming many Greeks between the ages of 14 to 34 feel tremendous love for the Greek music tradition. On the other hand, they hear rock and roll and all that music speaks to them in a very powerful way. How do they live in those two universes?"

Living in two universes is something Bromell is personally familiar with. His father worked in the Foreign Service and prior to college, he spent half of his time living in the United States and the other half abroad. His interest in Greece stems from his childhood, when he lived in Greece for several years and was raised learning English and Greek simultaneously.

Bromell likens returning to the US as a child to an immigrant experience.

"We did speak the language, but we didn't know any of the games," Bromell recalled. "We didn't know what cowboys were. We didn't know what spaceboys were. We made ourselves forget Greek."

In college, Bromell wanted to relearn his Greek. He spent his junior year abroad in Greece and has returned every 3 to 4 years since then, sometimes accompanied by his own family.

Bromell's family was a concern to him when accepting the Fulbright scholarship so much so that after the spring semester 2001, he visited Thessalonika to ensure it was a "place I could go with a family." On his first night in the city, Bromell was listening to a band of musicians in their 20s playing a form of folk music that had been outlawed in the 1930s.

According to Bromell, the musicians had noticed that he was the only one really listening to their music in the whole taverna (a Grecian pub), bought him a bottle of wine and a conversation ensued in Greek.

"My first night in Greece and I was already beginning my field work," he said. "It was great."

Bromell has been at UMass since 1987, and teaches courses on American literature and American studies. He is also the associate director for the English Department and will return to UMass for the fall semester 2002.

Search committee looks for new Chancellor

By Jennifer Teixeira
Collegian Correspondent

The search has started to find a new leader for the Amherst campus of the University of Massachusetts. A search committee has been formed and begun what could be as much as a yearlong process of finding a new Chancellor.

The committee is looking for a replacement for former Chancellor David K. Scott, who retired from the position in June after eight years at the helm. Former Deputy Chancellor Marcellette Williams has been serving as Interim Chancellor since Scott's departure.

As with other positions within the University, the Chancellorship will be filled by a formal search. For most of those positions, the structure of the search committee is devised by the hiring authority and approved by the Equal Opportunity Office in Whitmore.

The position is then advertised, and the search committee reviews the applicants. The field is narrowed and the committee interviews the remaining candidates. Sometimes another round of interviews is necessary before another decision is made; if no satisfactory candidates remain the procedure is repeated.

This search committee is somewhat different, however, because the Chancellor position is accountable to the central, statewide University administration. Nevertheless, regulations and state law prohibit members of the committee from divulging certain details of the proceedings, such as the names of the candidates. Board of Trustees and search committee chair Grace Fey did not respond to a request for comment.

Committee members did, however, confirm that the focus has turned to defining what qualities the next Chancellor should possess. Those who would comment highlighted the need for student involvement in evaluating the candidates in the later stages of the search.

Student Trustee Jon Laubinger, another member of the search committee, stressed the need for a Chancellor who will deal with the University's most pressing problems, while at the same time maintaining a student-oriented focus. Laubinger cited deferred maintenance, claiming that the Amherst campus was "nationally ranked" as one of America's ugliest universities. As a remedy, Laubinger said he would be looking for a Chancellor who prioritizes fundraising.

He also said the new Chancellor must keep the University "clearly focused on students." He pointed out that students are both "customers" and "future donors."

Other students will also have a chance to weigh in on what the next Chancellor's focus should be. According to both Laubinger and fellow committee member Javier Cevallos, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life at UMass, preliminary research has been done by Worcester campus Chancellor Dr. Aaron Lazare. Lazare's report will be released soon, said Cevallos, after which small discussion groups will be held to gauge student input, as well as the input from other facets of the campus community.

The committee has met once already. Their second meeting will be in mid-October, according to Laubinger.

W.E.B. Dubois Library ready for returning students; Improvements include tours, new equipment and exhibits

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

September is the month to get acquainted with the University of Massachusetts's library system. From guided tours and promotional gifts to new state-of-the-art equipment, historical exhibits and slides shows, the library system promises to provide new insights for all.

Tours

Starting today, tours of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library will allow newcomers to UMass to better understand the resources available to them and receive free gifts.

These two, hour-long tours each day (at 10: 30am and 2:30pm) will continue through this Friday and resume again the following week, from Monday, September 17 till Friday, September 21.

Starting at the entrance lobby, the tours will take interested students, faculty, staff, and community members through step-by-step library processes, such as borrowing a book or using the library's computer systems. No appointments are necessary.

Tour guides will also go over some new policies in detail, including the new food and drink policy, which mandates that no food be allowed inside the building and beverages be in covered, spill-proof containers.

"The [food and drink] policy," read a recent press release, "is intended to aid in the preservation and care of library materials and electronic equipment, to maintain pest-free buildings and damage-free furnishing, to reduce litter, and to ensure a clean, safe environment for studying and working."

Promoting the new policy, the library will give each tour taker a complimentary, library-approved, spill-proof travel mug. Arrangements for individual or private group tours at other times can be scheduled by calling the Reference Desk at 545-0150.

To make appointments for tours at either of the university's science libraries, call 545-2674 for the Biological Sciences Library or 545-1370 for the Physical Sciences and Engineering Library.

New Equipment

The UMass library system also proudly announced last week that installation of new office equipment for everyone's use is currently underway.

IKON Office Solutions, contracted to supply photocopying and printing hardware, software and technical support, began to replace old photocopiers, laser printers, microform printers and microform digitizers with new and enhanced machines on September 4.

Unlike the previous equipment, supplied by Copico, these machines will accept the UCard for payment in addition to change and $1 and $5 bills. However, the library will accept the old Copico copy cards during the first weeks of the semester and will also transfer a student's residual balance to his/her existing UCard debit accounts.

"We are confident that users will be pleased with the significant improvements to our copying and printing services," noted Barbara Jones, Associate Director for Administrative Services of UMass Libraries. "The new machines will have better features, and dedicated IKON technicians will be on-site 7 days a week to service them."

Regular copier will remain at ten cents a page. Laser printing, which will be available in Reference, Microforms, Government Documents, and in both science libraries, will move up to twenty cents a page. And printing for microforms will reduce to twenty cents a page.

Special Exhibits

For those interested in history, art, medicine, or ancient people in general, the W.E.B. Du Bois Library currently offers the exhibit "Woven Bands, Medicines and Recipes," organized by Special Collections and Archives expert, Ute Bargmann.

The exhibit, which describes the contents of a little-know 15th century manuscript and provides samples of woven bands made by Bargmann, will run on the library's Garden Level through the end of September.

"The manuscript provides weaving instructions, examples of medical remedies for people and animals, and for use in falconry," the Library said in a released statement.

Bargmann came across the manuscript while researching early weaving procedures. Upon receiving a microfilm copy of the text from the University of Heildelburg, she identified the convent that produced the manuscript and deciphered much of the text, including instructions for weaving bands for hair bands, belts, or chasubles.

On September 12 at noon, local falconer Tom Ricardi of Conway will provide a slide show, also located on the Garden Level, in hopes to offer a more comprehensive understanding of some the ramifications of the contents of the manuscript. Ricardi will also bring some of his birds for the presentation.

FLRC has new hours and more

The Foreign Language Resource Center (FLRC) has new hours, software and online audio lessons. Students studying French, Italian, Japanese, Portuguese, Russian, Spanish, IPA, and ESL are now able to have greater access to the Center and will be able to take advantage of the new technology upgrades.

Some of the new programs available are New Windows software for multilingual word processing. MS Word has been upgraded to include proofing tools such as grammar and spell checking in thirty languages.

The Center also now features Global Writer, which offers MS Word-compatible word processing and dictionaries in over 100 languages.

For students that have assignments that require audio cassettes that accompany language textbooks, several of these cassettes are now available as mp3 files. The link for these files is: http://www.umass.edu/langctr/online/audio.html.

The regular hours for the FLRC are: Monday-Thursday 8:30am-6:30 p.m.; Friday 8:30 a.m.-3:30 p.m.; and Sun 1:30 p.m.-6:30 p.m., except for the first and last Sunday of the term. The schedule varies for finals, holidays and vacations. For details, call 545-0950, or visit http://www.umass.edu/langctr/hours.html.

Evening and weekend classes may use the Center by appointment. For questions, please contact Irene Starr at Starr@langlab.umass.edu, or at 545-0950. The FLRC is located in Herter room 19. The improvements to the lab were made possible by a grant from the Chancellor's Counsel on Community, Diversity and Social Justice.

The United States Army announced that it would trim its aircraft fleet by roughly 1000 helicopters, in a released statement on Friday, September 7.

The plan would remove approximately 400 hundred Vietnam-era aircraft from active service and 600 from the reserve forces.

"This will include accelerating the retirement of the Vietnam-era UH-1 'Huey' helicopters and AH-1 Cobra attack helicopters. The acceleration will divest Army aviation of these 'legacy' aircraft by 2004," the release stated. "Aging aircraft are difficult and expensive to maintain and are far less effective than their modern successors, the UH-60 Blackhawk and the AH-64 Apache."

The Blackhawk is the Army's utility helicopter, useful for troop and cargo transport, as well as support missions. The AH-64 Apache is the Army's primary gunship helicopter, serving in combat and support roles since the late eighties. The twin propeller Vietnam-era Chinook will remain in service, as a medium/heavy lift aircraft.

"Aviation modernization is a good news story for the Army Reserve," said Chief of the Army Reserve Lt. Gen. Thomas J. Plewes. "It brings us the medium-lift capabilities of UH-60 Blackhawk companies, enabling us to more effectively support Army missions, and modernizes much of our current aircraft, including our Chinooks and Apaches."

The shift is the result of a two-year review by the Army to modernize its forces.

"This is a major step forward for Army aviation," said Director of the Army National Guard Lt. Gen. Roger Schultz. "Aviation formations are justified on war fighting requirements; however, in the Guard, our cargo and utility aircraft are used daily in response to local and state emergencies. The good news with this plan is that the Guard receives modern aircraft earlier than originally planned. For the Guard, turning in the legacy aircraft as we migrate to modernized aircraft is welcome news indeed. Our obligation today is to prepare for the future of Army aviation. This aviation modernization plan does just that."

The move also frees up funds and space for the Army's new helicopter gunship, the Comanche.

"It allows the Army to compress the procurement timeline of the Comanche aircraft and moves newer helicopters sooner into the U.S. Army National Guard and U.S. Army Reserve," the release stated. "For the long-term, Comanche remains The Army's highest aviation priority and is the centerpiece of Army aviation transformation. Comanche will provide the tactical commander more timely and accurate information about the tactical situation. It provides the ability to orchestrate devastating firepower and synchronize mobile security, even in the most challenging operational environments."

Peru and Chile talk about reducing arms

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

A meeting took place yesterday between the foreign and defense ministers of Peru and Chile, in order to discuss the topic of reducing arms spending in South America.

The meeting came on the heels of Chile's decision to purchase over $700 million worth of US warplanes, including 10 F-16 fighters and two KC-135 tanker planes that are used for midair fueling.

This is the latest headache for new Peruvian president Alejandro Toledo, who was sworn into office on July 28th, amongst talk of fighting the poverty and corruption that has recently plagued the country.

This corruption was evident in the term of Toledo's predecessor, Alberto Fujimori, who was forced from office after a string of scandals, most notably the illegal death squad killings that he authorized in the early 1990's.

"This meeting is highly symbolic and it is the start of a process, based on the common intention of our governments," Peru's Foreign Minister Diego Garcia Sayan told CNN reporters as he entered the meeting.

Although neighboring countries seem optimistic that the meeting will go a long way toward stopping an arms race that neither nation can afford, Chile has already started bolstering its armed forces, spending $2 billion on warships and other military equipment even before its recent airplane purchase.

This action has made Peru very wary, as the two countries have generally mistrusted each other since an 1879 war in which Chile took over fertile land in the southern region of Peru.

"I am very positive about this meeting. I hope that we will at least establish a binding mechanism for the future," Mario Fernandez, Chile's Defense Minister, said.

In his inaugural address, Toledo, the first elected Peruvian president with an indigenous background, shared his plans for helping his poverty-stricken nation, in which more than half of the country's habitants (over 13 million people) live below the poverty line.

The newly elected president talked about increasing housing for the poor, investing in small businesses with the hope of stimulating the economy and mentioned plans for universal health care and a new system of education for the poor as well.

Toledo also plans to restructure the armed forces and the police force in order to slow down corruption and looked for ways to increase tourism. Peru sports a large section of tropical rainforest that could potentially attract tourists much the same way the Costa Rica uses its rainforest to attract tourists in Central America.

In order to accomplish all of these things, Toledo had hoped for an immediate freeze on weapon buying so that money formerly spent on the military could now be used for domestic programs.

Mexican President ends visit; Bush and Fox talk frankly

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

United Mexican States' President Vicente Fox ended his three-day visit to the United States on September 6.

The visit, the first by President Fox to the US under the Bush Administration, was marked with a series of discussions on immigration and trade. In a joint statement from both Presidents, the White House categorized the discussions as "frank."

"This first state visit of the Bush Administration highlights the mutual trust and respect between our two Presidents and governments. It also testifies to the unequaled priority both Presidents attach to a practical and cooperative approach to the common opportunities and challenges we face as the well-being and prosperity of our peoples becomes increasingly intertwined in our shared North American community," the White House said. "This results-oriented approach, and the commitment to shared responsibility and partnership undergirding it, are already generating unprecedented levels of cooperation throughout our rich and diverse relationship."

Presidents Bush and Fox met with faculty, students and community groups at the University of Toledo in Toledo, Ohio on Thursday.

"We just had a really good visit in Washington. It was a commitment to friendship. It's important for my fellow Americans to understand my foreign policy, and it starts with this: Good foreign policy says you want your neighborhood to be peaceful and prosperous," President Bush said. "A good foreign policy starts with being friends with your neighbors. We're friends with our neighbors to the North, and we're very good friends with our neighbors to the South, the Mexicanos."

Immigration discussions between the Presidents included possible ways of dealing with the issue, to ensure that it is, in the words of the White House, "safe, orderly, legal and dignified, and agreed on the framework within which this ongoing effort is based." Possible solutions discussed include matching willing workers with willing employers, respecting the human dignity of all migrants, regardless of their status and shared responsibility for ensuring migration takes place through safe and legal channels.

"Oh, I know there's a lot of talk about Mexican laborers coming to the United States. There are mothers and dads in Mexico who love their children just as much as mothers and dads in America do. And if there is a mother or dad who can't find work, worried about food on the table, they're going to come and find work in America," President Bush said. "And what we want to do is to have a trading relationship that encourages job creation in America, but job creation in Mexico, as well. We're talking about migration issues. It's a complex subject, but one that this country of ours must confront and have an open dialogue about. And we've made good progress on that important issue."

President Fox recounted success stories of immigrants and commended America on its policy of immigration.

"How many stories could be told of the lives of so many Mexican men and women who, one day, decided to leave their country, to come here seeking new opportunities in this great nation. How many stories of hard work and of sacrifice. One of these is the story of Rosario Marin, an exemplary Mexican who came to this nation at the age of 14 and who recently was appointed Treasurer of the United States of America," President Fox said. "We are proud of her efforts and her success, as well as we are proud of all Mexican women that work day by day in this country, and that contribute to its greatness and to its success. This land of opportunity, the United States, has always kept its door open to countless immigrants from all over the world, remaining true to its founding principles."

Trade and investment between the United States and Mexico is at record levels, the White House says. They stressed the need to abide by the provisions of our free trade agreement and agreed to the importance of vigorous measures to ensure that the full benefits of economic development and trade are extended to all regions of Mexico.

"I've seen it firsthand; trade between Mexico and the United States has grown to a quarter of a trillion dollars. That means jobs in the United States and as importantly, that means jobs in Mexico. There's a lot of discussion about trade," said President Bush. "I can't tell you how hopeful trade is and how important it is. It's not only important for job-seeking Americans, it's incredibly important for Mexico to grow and to prosper, to develop a middle class for people in Mexico to be able to find work close to home."

Stem-cell discussion coming to UMass

Panelists include doctors, researchers and ethicists

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The heavily debated issue of stem cell research will be discussed at the University of Massachusetts in an informational hearing with the Legislature's Joint Committee on Health Care.

The event will be held on Friday, September 14 in room 168C of the Campus Center and is scheduled to begin at 10 a.m. and will continue until 2 p.m. Panelists include doctors, researchers, and ethicists, all of who will provide their opinions about the future of medicine with the inclusion of stem cell technology. The talk is free and open to the public.

"Stem cell research is more than just an idea in Massachusetts- it's a reality," Harriett Stanley, Chair of the committee said in a statement to the press. "Scientists and researchers in the academic community, as well as the private bio-tech industry are developing new research that will lead to new disease treatment protocols."

The stem cell is capable of developing into any kind of tissue, and is often taken from an embryo during the developmental stage of life at the point in which the cells can be programmed to become a different type of cell.

Because the stem cells are difficult to obtain, useful cells are often only found in embryos, a fact which has been causing much ethical and moral debate regarding medicine versus the value of life.

A number of people, including Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Mississippi) came out against using taxpayer dollars to fund research for stem cell research.

"It doesn't have to be, you know, embryo stem-cell research or fetal or cloning," Lott explained to CNN. "There are very serious concerns here from the moral and bio-ethicist's standpoint that you have to evaluate. I believe, though, that there's a great deal that you can do in terms of research with adult stem cells or other cells that come from umbilical cords, things of that nature."

The Vatican also came out against stem cell research explaining that by using embryonic cells it would be a form of abortion.

"This moral condemnation also regards procedures that exploit living human embryos and fetuses sometimes 'produced' for this purpose by in vitro fertilization, either to be used as 'biological material' or as providers or organs or tissue for transplants in the treatment of certain diseases," the 1995 papal encyclical stated. "The killing of innocent human creatures, even if carried out to help others, constitutes an absolutely unacceptable act."

President George W. Bush took opinions into consideration before making his announcement on August 9th to allow limited stem cell research. Bush announced on television that he would allow research on the currently existing 60 lines or colonies of stem cells. The President took about three months to make his decision and consulted with a number of experts on both sides of the issue in order to make his decision. By deciding to allow research on the existing 60 lines he has allowed for research, while at the same time preventing any new embryos from being used.

"He worked to achieve a solution that recognized the tremendous hopes of those who suffer from terrible illnesses." Presidential Counselor Karen Hughes said in a press conference. "On the other hand, he has strong moral convictions and felt all along that there was a line we should not cross."

Scientists believe that stem cell research may allow for cures to such diseases as Alzheimer's, Parkinson's and diabetes as well as a possibility for cures to spinal cord injuries.

"We must be well informed about the long and short term potential of this research," Stanley explained. "It's risks and rewards, as well as the impact of federal policy governing the use of public funding for research."

Getting into classes
Some tips of the trade

Standing room only, bustling and shoving. The scenario sounds like a concert however it can look like any general education or major requirement class on campus.

Classes at this school are difficult to get. Popular classes are often over enrolled. This semester however, they have gotten to the point of near impossibility with a larger than average freshman class contributing to congestion on campus. With crowding in classes students have had to fight for seats and beg for spaces.

Still don't have classes? Don't despair! Nearly all of the rest of the campus is a couple of credits short as well. Start using the add/drop period to your advantage. Call the system over and over again if you are really interested in getting into a class. When other students drop the class you will be the first there to pick it up. Although it may take away all of your opportunities for a social life, your schedule will thank you later.

Go to the classes that you are interested in. There is no substitute for actual, physical presence in the classroom to keep your name fresh in the professor's head when the time comes to decide who comes off the wait list and who gets to keep searching for a home. Keep attending regardless of the fact that they may be overenrolled. Oftentimes students enroll in classes that they do not want to take, and their laziness can be your gain when they take their miserable selves elsewhere. After two missed classes they are forced dropped from the class roster allowing new students to be added- possibly students who have continually attended the class that they are not a part of, sat in the front, asked questions and acted overall annoying. So don't get discouraged – keep going.

Still having problems? You may want to try to go to your department and see what classes have extra spots or which professors are willing to take on a couple additional students, they may be able to give you a good idea of which professors to approach and how to go about talking to them.

Individual departments have information about how many students are in their specific major classes and even how many students are in their department sponsored general education class. Because of the overcrowding the University has added some extra night sessions to popular classes that are not listed in the pre-registration book.

Online courses are another option that may allow you to take classes you need. Also, the campus offers a number of classes in all departments that can be taken through the Department of Continuing Education. These classes can mean more time to sleep and talk to your friends online and less time looking for spots in an already overfilled class.

Are you having the opposite problem? Trying to hold on to an awful class that you would rather drop? Do yourself a favor and just get rid of it. Besides the fact that tons of other students are likely fighting tooth and nail to get your spot, chances are if you hate your class you will not attend. Save yourself the trouble of having the class appear on your transcript in a negative way and drop it now.

Remember, classes are the basis of education. Take some.

There will be a general interest meeting for all students interested in working at the Daily Collegian on Tuesday night at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center basement. Stop by the office for more info or email us at collegianeditorial@yahoo.com.

Going through the archives:
A look at what happened in the summer of 2001

BRIAN LOHNES

Monday! Monday! Monday! Well, UMass, the fourth and final installment of the 'Brian Lohnes pathetic plea for help' tour has rolled into Amherst. So much has happened at our quaint 400-pound gorilla of a university over the summer; they booted students from the dorms, began constructing the bomb shelter attached to the School of Management and Chancellor Scott packed up his stuff and left town.

If any astute readers remember a column of mine from the beginning of last year, I wrote about my apartment lacking phone service. Well, not to be outdone, the US Postal Service took it upon themselves to decide that my apartment was vacant and that all of the mail coming to my roommates and I should be returned to the sender. Bills? Sent back. Important notices? Sent Back. What wasn't sent back was a letter from The Love Company, whose motto is, "When loves needs a plan." Love doesn't need a plan; I need a damn plan to get my bills back.

A guy who did need a plan was the moron who managed to fly himself into the damn Statue of Liberty this summer. It would have been less embarrassing for him if he were at least flying a real plane instead of a big fan strapped to his back with a parachute wing over his head. Apparently this guy was performing "a stunt" by circling the statue. All was going well until the moron's parachute/wing hooked the flame of the torch. Now hanging over 300 feet above the ground, rescue personnel was called in and they managed to drag the guy down to safety. The "stuntman" was fined by the state of New York. Unfortunately, the plea for euthanasia made by the prosecution was turned down.

Kudos to the residents of Seattle, Washington for convincing one of their own residents to jump 160 feet off a bridge. The troubled woman had caused a traffic jam by threatening to hurl herself off the biggest bridge in town. Apparently, concerned and sympathetic drivers began screaming at the woman to jump. First off, the lady probably wanted to jump because she lived in Seattle. Forecast? Rain, followed by a light rain and then a delightful and refreshing shower. The way I figure it, the line at the coffee shop was too long for her or she had just invested in a company that marketed clothes to "grunge" fans. And to the sorry bastards that were yelling at the woman to jump, she did. Be happy to know that she lived and will probably be up and around and ready to kick some ass in a few weeks.

Sharks. Sweet, sweet, sharks. The summer of 2001 will be forever known as a human buffet with sharks being the prime consumers. Every year there are at least a couple of stories involving sharks, alligators, crows, a drunken clown or a dog biting the crap out of people. This summer sharks were so violent they were scaring themselves. If it moved, they bit. Kids, adults, pre-teens and even run-of-the-mill teens were all targeted and attacked by sharks. Local news channels quickly jumped on the stories and answered the question, "What should you do when you have been bitten?" That's just what the world needs: the local "investigative" reporter who last week told us the supermarket scanner was off by .012 cents, is now telling us how to survive shark attacks.

> "Sharks. Sweet, sweet, sharks. The summer of 2001 will be forever known as a human buffet with sharks being the prime consumers."

Finally, in local news, Butterfield was emptied of all its residents. Students are crying foul and the administration is saying that they couldn't let the inmates take over the asylum up there. If even half of what the university brass is claiming is actually true, there is no way that they could sit idly by and let that kind of stuff go on. Well, I guess the lesson is that a few idiots can screw over a large number of people and completely betray the long and storied history of a part of our campus.

One down, a whole-bunch more to go. See you next week.

Brian Lohnes is a Collegian Columnist.

I still haven't found

KEN CAMPBELL

I find it incredibly pathetic that I am now a senior at this university and still get lost.

I still wander around Hasbrouck and Morrill, looking for phantom auditoriums where oh-so-important classes with "Intro" in their titles wait to impart on me some modicum of information I've already written a twenty page paper on for one of my other, more numerically intimidating classes.

The good news is that I'm not alone on my little detours through boiler rooms and seldom used closets. I'm surrounded by dozens of fresh faced, bright-eyed freshmen. It truly gives one a Moses complex. "Hurrill 'N' Esp! Let my people go!"

At the risk of sounding patronizing, let me say how young all these freshmen are. I mean, they may be 18, but they really don't look it. Either that or my eyes have aged faster than the rest of me, because I seriously think that some of these kids are like Doogie Howser, zipping through college.

I hope they understand that.

Friends! Minutemen! Upper class people! Think of all they missed. Most were born in 1985, which means they were three when the Challenger exploded. They were six when Hazelwood had a few martinis and decided to play slalom with the Exxon Valdez in Prince William Sound. None of them remember Ollie North testifying on every TV in the nation. None of them were alive when the President was shot. Granted, I was only one when Ronnie took a round in the chest, but just to expound on my point: They're young!

But they have their own milestones. They remember where they were when OJ was found not guilty. They remember watching Columbine on TV, and the aftermath of the Oklahoma City bombing.

To them, Breakfast Club and Better Off Dead are Comedy Central Saturday afternoon movies instead of videos that your friends' older brother rented and let you watch. Their horror movies are Scream and I Know What You Did Last Summer, not Friday the 13th Part 5. Remember that strap scene in the woods, when that guy's head split? What eight year-old wasn't fascinated?

But there are similarities between these young chaps I mentioned they're young?) collegians and upperclassmen like myself. For instance, the campus remains predominantly ugly to both groups. The SGA still manages to screw both groups over with equal success. And for all of us, the clock is ticking.

> "In a perfect world, I'll have my degree; in a not so perfect world, I'll be taking night classes and flipping burgers back on the South Shore."

Nice segue, huh?

It really is only nine months before I leave this university, one way or the other. In a perfect world, I'll have my degree; in a not so perfect world, I'll be taking night classes and flipping burgers back on the South Shore.

For our freshmen friends, the world of UMass is their oyster. Everything to them is new, exciting and wonderful. And a bit scary at times. They've been told time and time again that these, right here, are the best years of their lives and pretty soon it will end.

How sad.

Listen; whoever told you that college would be the best time of your life isn't living the right way. They aren't trying to squeeze every moment of joy and happiness out the day. Personally, I hope my best years are my last ones, whenever those may be. I am having a great time here; I love my college experience, all of the ups and downs included. But I want to keep having a great time in life, and we should all keep that in mind.

Everyone should think, upon graduation, 'wow, that was the greatest time of my life', but shouldn't think that that's where it's going to stop. Oh well, college is over, time to get serious and never crack a smile as long as I live. High school guidance counselors and other sad depressing forms of life, like college newspaper columnists, spew that kind of crap.

Live it up, kids. And then keep it up. Keep living the life you want and trying to make everyday your best one.

And trust me, this is about as optimistic as I get.

Letters to the editor:
Missile defense pours in

To the Editors:

I write in response to Ken Campbell's ill-considered and wildly inaccurate "look at the U.S. missile policy." First of all, he writes:

"As things stand right now, it is possible for the United States to destroy an incoming ballistic missile safely in flight." This is completely false. The U.S. has been testing a new system that might, someday, be able to shoot down an incoming ICBM under actual combat conditions. As it is, the system can't hit anything unless the test is rigged. It would not, as he suggests, "protect against any launch."

Second, he argues that we should build a national anti-ballistic missile system, even though it violates the ABM treaty that we signed in 1972, because "there is always the threat of Ivan waking up on the wrong side of a vodka bottle." Moreover, Mr. Campbell "does not trust Putin and [he] does not trust China. The ties between Russia and current communist countries worry [him], especially since Russian communists are trying to seize power again." I agree with Mr. Campbell that there is much to worry about regarding Russia, China, and North Korea, but breaking the ABM treaty will only make things worse, because they all fear the U.S. – and with good reason. We have the largest nuclear arsenal on earth, which can hit any city on earth; we have never made any commitment not to use these weapons; and we have already used nuclear weapons on civilian targets in Asia. The last thing we should do to preserve our safety is make those other nuclear powers nervous.

Finally, his suggestion that we embrace this white elephant, not despite its cost but because of it, because it will create jobs, is laughable. Job creation is, indeed, a fine use of federal tax dollars, but only if the people so employed will be doing something like repairing the nation's highway system, or building power plants, or really anything that might actually be useful and not a complicated weapon system that, even if it could be made to work, would hopefully never be used.

Besides, explosions are only cool on TV.

Michael S. Dow
Graduate student/GEO

To the Editors:

I enjoyed Mr. Campbell's commentary and agree that a missile defense system is necessary, but I believe he cut off his best argument for having one to talk about the political ramifications instead. During the Cold War, our missile defense system against nuclear capable parties, namely Russia, was a plan of Mutually Assured Destruction (MAD). If they nuked us, we would retaliate and the threat of destruction was sufficient to ensure peace. Nowadays nuclear equipment has fallen into the hands of parties with less to lose. Terrorists and the rogue nations Mr. Campbell mentioned are the real threat, and rocket capability from them is the real problem.

Bin-Laden and his group Hamas wouldn't blink twice to fire, even if it meant heavy casualties in his host country, since he has no political ties or responsibility to the citizenry. Rogue groups draw their power from their weapons, not the masses, like Russia in the Cold War or Japan in WWII. Right now they probably don't have rockets to carry their arms, and we should be able to bomb from aircraft carriers before it gets out of hand, but who knows when that might change. This problem has no warning signs except for a cloud of smoke and a whiff of compressed rocket fuel. When engineers and architects know a fire in a building could kill everyone, they build fire exits. Just so happens in this case the fire exits cost a few trillion and the building is an island called Manhattan with 20 million people living on it. Unlike most problems, we cannot afford any bumps in the road to finding a solution. It will take time and it will take money, but such is the cost of living in a free country.

Fall fashion- 80s revisited

By Shauna Billings
Collegian Staff

I don't know whether it was the election of Dub-ya, or the precarious condition our economy seems to be in, but something has propelled our nation into a vicious spiral of 80's yuppie greed, and fashion is eating it up. So tie a sweater jauntily around your shoulders, grab some Tab with Buffy, be a Karma Chameleon and read up on the latest of fashion's recycled trends.

Everyone has had this happen: you go out shopping with one of your parents, or you bring something home and they crack up laughing because they used to own something very similar when they were in high school or college. I always thought that it would mean you were old when something that you used to wear comes back into style. Never did I think that at 21, I'd be wearing things I had worn just a little over a decade earlier.

I went to the mall for a little back to school shopping, and was all psyched about the return of the preppy look. Plaid pants and pleated skirts? Lacoste alligators and little polo players embroidered onto the breast of polo shirts? V-neck Marino wool sweaters? Life doesn't get much more comfy and casual. Of course, the ultimate in happiness for me is rugby shirts. They were all I wore on a weekends as a kid, because my dad worked at a prep school, and would bring us back all the lost-and-never-found shirts at the end of each semester. So as I piled my arms with argyle sweaters, t-shirts with PREP scripted across the chest, and ribbon belts to try on in the dressing room, I was surprised to hear laughter from the girls next to me. They were snickering at all the preppy clothes from my childhood, specifically laughing at this teal terry-cloth halter-top.

Apparently they're just too young to understand the nod to the 1980's, and the satirical sniff fashion is making at our millennium yuppieness. But it nonetheless made me feel ancient (just as I did when I watched some freshman boys recoiled in horror after I stopped their pick-up lines with the fact that I'm a senior. I thought they were going to call me ma'am and help me across the street.)

Other hot preppy items this fall include corduroy blazers, fisherman sweaters and bowling shoes. Both guys and girls can get in on the 80's fun; available at all stores – from Banana Republic to American Eagle to Wal-Mart. If you're more the rebellious type, and can't see the humor in wearing the clothes we grew up in, why not live up the 80's punk style that is also hot this fall.

Seeing as we were all wearing Velcro shoes and overalls during the early 80's, and missed all the fun of Cure-like hairdos, studded everything and ripped lace tights, join in on the Brit-punk funk look. It seems that everywhere you go, everyone is wearing studs – studded belts and bedazzled jean skirts, and let's not forget that all the girls at the frats this year have studs on the shirts and self-proclaimed studs on their arms (sorry, I'm required by contract to put at least one lame pun in all my columns). Another nod to the old punk look are safety pins on everything. It's kind of a little silly though, when they have shirts that are already sewn together, then toss some pins on to make it look all hard core. And lots not forget the airbrushed T-shirt look – the Della's catalog is infamous for one's that say "American Beauty" and "Cherry." To be extra punk, if you think you can handle it, you too could cut that airbrushed shirt and throw on a few safety pins. Think of how tough everyone will think you are!

Continuing on with the whole British-punk idea, I'd just like to ask what the deal is with the flag of Great Britain adorning everything from shirts to earrings. Our flag wasn't red, white and blue enough for anyone? Or couldn't they have picked a more Interest-

Every year viewers anticipate watching the MTV Video Music Awards to find out who is going to deliver the most shocking performance on or offstage. Surprisingly, however, the 2001 MTV VMAs, which aired live on September 6, failed to live up to expectations.

Even actor and comedian Jamie Foxx, who hosted the 2001 MTV Video Music Awards wasn't outrageous, let alone funny (although he admittedly did better than last year's hosts Shawn and Marlon Wayans).

Fatboy Slim's "Weapon of Choice" video was the big winner of this year's VMAs, winning six of the nine awards for which it was nominated, but it was the kitschy video "Lady Marmalade" that took home the Best Video of the Year award.

"Lady Marmalade," the Moulin Rouge-inspired video, was a collaboration featuring Pink, Christina Aguilera, Mya, Lil' Kim, and Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliot. It also received an award for best video from a film.

The night's other big winner was 'N Sync, who received four awards for their special-effects laden video, "Pop," including the Viewers Choice award.

The "Weapon of Choice" video by Fatboy Slim, doesn't even feature the artist; its star is actor and dancer Christopher Walken, tapping and flying to the music. Among the early awards it nabbed was for Best Direction, for Spike Jonze, and Best Choreography.

No Doubt's Gwen Stefani won both the Best Female and Best Male video awards as her collaborations with Eve in "Let Me Blow Ya Mind" and with Moby in "South Side," both garnered awards.

As quadruple winner 'N Sync capped off a colorful rendition of "Pop," which had the stage crafted into a giant ad space to correlate with the theme of the song's consumable product message, Michael Jackson made a surprise appearance. An enormous Etch-a-Sketch board was lowered as the words "Kings of Pop" read on screen. As the "s" was dropped spelling out "King of Pop," Jackson emerged and danced robotically for only a few seconds (without singing) to 'N Sync's hit but, nevertheless, received a standing ovation.

One of the truly hilarious moments in the show came when Triumph the Insult Comic Dog from Conan O' Brien made fun of Carson Daly and Jennifer Lopez. "I.Lo, please let me sniff your butt. For a dog it's like climbing Mt. Everest," the dog snipped.

But most of the excitement stopped there. Even Britney Spears' performance of her new song "I'm a Slave 4 You" disappointed and surely failed to top last years "Oops...I Did It Again" striptease gyrations. Despite the teen queen slithering on stage with a snake and using caged cheetahs (despite reported opposition from PETA), the song and performance failed to elicit any jungle fever.

Macy Gray showed up Mudvayne when she presented the MTV2 award, spotlighting emerging artists, to the group. Gray told the crowd "to take a minute and concentrate on my dress," which read: "My new album drops Sept. 18. 2001." She then turned around and had the audience read: "Buy It."

The night experienced a technical problem as U2 was about to perform "Elevation," and "Stuck in a Moment You Can't Get Out Of," forcing MTV to cut to commercials until it was fixed. The wait was worth it as U2 rocked the house with one of the best performances of the night.

"So MTV weren't paying their electricity bill," said Bono before the group received the Michael Jackson Video Vanguard award for lifetime achievement.

The 2001 MTV VMAs were the longest in recent memory going over by almost thirty minutes for a total air time of about 3 1/2 hours. Foxx's lame jokes didn't help move the show at any faster pace. Next year MTV needs to reintroduce Chris Rock, who deserves his title as the Funniest Man in America. As stated earlier, this year's VMAs were comparatively tame to years before. Award shows are a dime a dozen, and MTV, which used to be a few steps ahead of them all, seems to be losing ground.

Ghost World proves stagnant to viewers in this world

Ghost World
Starring Thora Birch, Scarlett Johannson and Steve Buscemi
Playing at the Academy of Music, Northampton

There is a scene in Ghost World when Thora Birch asks a man sitting on a bench, forever waiting for a bus that will never come, if he knows that his wait is pointless. He promises her that the bus will come. She accepts that and walks away.

Whether or not the bus actually does arrive, Ghost World never arrives. Starring – beside American Beauty's Birch – Steve Buscemi and Scarlett Johannson, the film never really goes anywhere, only showing in more and more complex story lines just how depressing the characters' world really is.

Based on the eight graphic novels of Daniel Clowes, Ghost World stars Birch and Johannson as typically disaffected youths who find it easier to confront the depressing banality of their world with sarcasm and wit than with simple apathy. They choose not to look the other way, but instead to look right at that which depresses them. Birch leads Johannson with her searing view of the world. Johannson comes along for the ride, but seems more likely to accept her place in the world rather than challenge it.

Finding a personal advertisement in a local arts magazine, Birch and Johannson reply. Birch claiming she is the woman described in the magazine. She set up a date with the loser – played to perfection by Buscemi – who arrives but never realizes the girls in the corner are the ones that set him up. Birch, however, can't help her self. She wants to know more about the man. She, with the guilty Johannson in tow, follow him back to his apartment, and later find him at a yard sale, where it is revealed that he is a record collector, a recluse, and a loser. In other words, perfect for Birch.

Birch's interest in Buscemi tears away at her friendship with Johannson, who having just finished four years of high school, wants to

After Whoracle, In Flames still rocks- album an amazing ride in own home

By Rob Schulze

IN FLAMES
The Tokyo Showdown Live
Nuclear Blast

In Flames is the greatest metal band in the world. This has been the case since the Swedes' 1997 concept album Whoracle shredded all preconceptions of extreme music and single-handedly created a new genre of metal. Sometimes called the 'melodic death sound' or the 'Gothenburg sound' but perhaps most honestly labeled the 'In Flames sound,' the album spawned imitators and inspired originators the world over.

The band expanded upon what they had created with their follow-ups Colony in 1999 and Clayman in 2000. Each release built upon the last and, while they weren't the gunshot in the night that Whoracle was, they continuously proved why the band were the masters of extreme music whom none could touch. Then they went on the road to prove it to the world, live.

In Flames toured the world in support of Clayman for over a year beginning in 2000, including two swings through the United States. Both tours (the first with Skinlab and Walls of Jericho, the second with Nevermore and Shadows Fall) made stops in Worcester, Massachusetts. It was my privilege to have attended both of those performances, one in August and one in November.

They were magical shows. With only the house lights upon them, the band came out and laid waste to all expectations. Stripped of all accessories, with not even the standard strobe light and smoke machine, five men with their instruments proved that they weren't just a phenomenal studio band, that they could blow you away in person as well. It was a war. In Flames won every night.

Now we have a documentary of one of those battles. The Tokyo Showdown Live isn't one of those "greatest hits" live albums where the band records their whole tour, picks the best performances of specific songs, and patches them together with liberal doses of studio magic (think Pantera's Official Live). No, this is what should be called an "honest" live album – one show, no frills, no remixing or studio meddling, just the music as it happened (think Biohazard's No Holds Barred). The mark of a band that has nothing to hide, this honest live album captures In Flames in all their magic and brutality.

The band wisely opens the show with the opening songs from their last three albums, "Bullet Ride," "Embody the Invisible" and "Jotun." The mammoth scream of the crowd following "Jotun" could probably be heard on the Chinese mainland, but it only lasts for a moment before the band, refusing to let up, jumps right into the brutality of "Food for the Gods" from Whoracle. It is only after these four songs that there is a let up, and then only for twenty seconds while vocalist Anger Friden thanks the crowd and introduces the next song, "Moonshield" from 1995's The Jester Race.

The endless ironies of a Swede speaking heavily accented English to a Japanese crowd never ceases to amuse me, by the way.

The band made wise choices for the rest of the set, having a slower track "Only For the Weak" follow the black metal of "Behind Space," hitting up such favorites as "Scorn" and "Ordinary Story" from Colony and digging deep to uncover "Gyroscope," a stellar but often-overlooked track from Whoracle. The set list is well-chosen and overall very fair to the band's catalog, with five songs from Clayman, four from Colony, four from Whoracle, and two from their previous lesser-known efforts. Since some of their songs appear in different versions on more than one album, every release in In Flames' history is covered except for the 1994 Subterranean EP.

By the end of the album the crowd isn't quite as loud as it was before, as even the hardiest fans must fade before an assault such as this. Still, there are many bands that would be envious of the reaction that the first few notes of classic tune "Colony" gets, and when it is followed by the death-metal screaming of album-ending "Episode 666," the mayhem is palpable.

Even on CD, coming out of a stereo, living through this show is draining. While not as good as being there, it's easily the next best thing and an amazing ride even in your living room. Don't consider this just a live album. Consider it a statement from the greatest metal band in the world to all their imitators, a challenge saying that not only do they make the best albums but that they also put on the best shows night after night. Consider it a challenge that no band is likely to meet.

get a job and an apartment. Birch, having to finish a summer arts class, is still living based strictly on her interests, thinking about little more than a day-to-day existence. The chasm between the two of them grows as Birch continues to see Buscemi. Birch sets him up on a date with the original woman from the personal advertisement, then gets upset when the burgeoning relationship threatens to work out. When she finally goes after Buscemi – one of the movies best moments – she is left unfulfilled after loving him.

This wasn't what she wanted.

If that movie is about nothing else, it's about Birch's total inability to figure out what she wants. Does she want to escape, as she makes clear several times throughout the movie, or does she want everything to stay her version of 'how it used to be?' She clearly never knows and even at the end of the movie, when she finally makes a decision, one is left wondering if it was no more impulsive than her decision to bed Buscemi.

Terry Zwigoff, who directed Crumb in 1995, has made a movie that at times seems blatantly congratulatory. In one of the Ghost World's earliest scenes with Buscemi, Zwigoff makes a self-indulgent reference to Crumb, earning him a laugh from the Zwigoff fans who caught the reference. Sure, it isn't a scene where characters discuss the merit of the 1995 biopic, but it's close enough. When he isn't patting himself on the back, Zwigoff's (and by extension, Clowes') world is beautifully set. Clearly, both knew exactly what they were looking for when it came to capturing a world almost totally devoid of any soul. Instead, in a sea of lush corporate colors, there is nothing but a chilling cold.

Only in the rooms of the two main characters, Birch and Buscemi, is anything original found. Buscemi's collection of blues and ragtime recordings, and the corresponding posters, showbills and instruments, are perhaps the most genuine scenes. Dark browns and yellow light capture the kind of room that seems to be apropos for Buscemi's blues. Birch's desperate collection of anything different – her seeming bemusement with anything that isn't from Ikea – is similarly colored, in faded reds and oranges.

But while the world is deep and textured, the characters never go anywhere, and only Buscemi seems to make even passing attempts at the world. Birch can't accept any of it, and her story of world alienation never comes together at the end. She might as well stay waiting for a bus that's going to take her somewhere. She certainly didn't go anywhere during the movie.

ing flag to spread throughout the pages of Vogue? Britain's is kind of done.

The last 80's look that has been reinvented for this fall is the look of painted and acid-washed jeans. Thankfully, the fully whitened and bleached look of acid-wash hasn't come back in, but an updated version has. The best selling jeans this fall are dark wash jeans, with a very faded strip down the front and back of each leg. Stores like Express are also showing jeans encrusted with glitter and jewels, or embroidered with fancy fordache-like back pockets.

With all the reduced-reused-recycled looks being shown this fall, you might be wondering if there's ANYTHING new in the stores. Unfortunately, we haven't really seen anything really original this year to date. Geometric prints, military looks, and asymmetrical lines are still as big in fashion this fall as they were this past spring. It appears that the world of fashion is in a period of stasis, just waiting for something to happen to spark a new fashion revolution. Until then, embrace the looks of our childhood, but don't embrace anyone wearing a shirt with enumerate safety pins, as it may be bad for your health. Remember, it's all fun and games until someone loses an eye.

year," Pouncey said. "Lytton is doing a great job, better than I would have done."

The battle started slow with both teams playing 'let's pass the ball' for 42 minutes before Terrier Bjorn Jacobson was able to put one past keeper O'Quinn off the left corner post.

The Minutemen came roaring back into the second half when junior Ptah Myers broke away from the pack and advanced on Terrier keeper Smith. The breakaway was halted when Smith knocked Myers down, fouling him before a potential goal that would have evened the score. Myers was reprieved with a penalty kick by senior tri-captain Jeff Deren. Deren's open shot landed in the top right corner of the net – tying the game at one apiece. Both goals by Deren on the night were unassisted.

Senior Shawn Green tried to put the team on the board for a second time with 18 minutes left in regulation but was denied when his shot skimmed over the crossbar.

UMass returns to action Friday at 2 p.m. at Totman field where it will host Siena in the opening game of the UMass Classic.

Minutewomen.

Kenny described the Bulls as "really scrappy" and a "tough team to play," but she was pleased with the overall effort given by her club.

"They created havoc for us, but I thought we got better after each game," she said.

However, the Minutewomen saved their best performance for last, as they completely overwhelmed New Hampshire on Saturday night. It seemed the Maroon and White could do no wrong in sweeping the Wildcats 3-0 (30-18, 30-24, 30-23). Small led the way with 14 kills while contributing seven digs on the defensive end. DeMarte added in 13 kills and Vander Veen contributed ten in an all-around solid performance by the entire Maroon and White squad.

"Our offense was on fire," said Kenny. "Our attack was extremely well-balanced tonight."

After falling behind to the Wildcats 12-6 early in the first game, the Minutewomen took charge, rallying off nine straight points to go up 15-12. The run was made possible by kills from Stehnova and Wiste, as well as taking advantage of several errors by UNH. When the Wildcats cut the lead to 22-17 later on in the game, UMass went on another run, highlighted by two kills each from Wiste and DeMarte to take eight of the final nine points.

The trend continued in the second and third games, as any time UNH mustered any semblance of a rally, the Minutewomen were there to put up more points and dash any hopes the visitors had of victory. Kenny contributed the solid performance to being aware in advance of the Wildcats' game plan, and using this knowledge to their advantage.

"We knew what they were going to do, and we knew if we could stop it, they wouldn't be able to do much else," she said.

The Minutewomen will kick off a seven game road trip next weekend as they travel to Tallahassee, Fla. to participate in the Florida State Classic.

KEVIN MOORE/COLLEGIAN

Senior DeShon Hardy made four catches for 90 yards and one touchdown Saturday night against Marshall.

"I was very disappointed in the receivers today. They were running into each other, running the wrong routes and they just didn't make plays," Whipple said last week.

Quite a far cry from Saturday night's contest where Hardy and his fellow flankers were snaring balls thrown high, behind them and into traffic, making a red shirt freshman more confident with every throw.

Not that Whipple is displeased with the emergence of Hardy as a No. 1 receiver; he just wished he knew about him. After totaling only 30 catches in his entire career, including last year when Hardy was forced into a starting role due to injury, he seemingly emerged out from under Whipple's nose.

Guice certainly did not have the best passing game in collegiate football history but he was able to make plays when he had to and a lot of the credit for that must go to Hardy.

A four-catch outing does not exactly designate dominance, but the time and manner in which he caught them is what is important.

Every time Guice (12-36, 149 yards, 1 TD) needed a big play that his scrambling feet couldn't provide he looked to Hardy.

On third and long, nearing the end of the first quarter, with UMass down by two touchdowns, Guice found his safety valve on a sideline out pattern for a 22-yard touchdown.

Then in the Maroon and White's biggest play of the game, on fourth down and 10 and desperately needing a score (or at least a first down), the freshman gunslinger took his drop and locked onto No. 9 (Hardy).

Hardy ran a 15-yard slant pattern right into the heart of the Marshall defense. Guice spotted his man and fired a spiraling pass, high, but into his receivers grasp. As Hardy leaped to make the grab he was devastated by two Marshall defenders, which left the ball hanging high in the Huntington air. As Hardy fell towards the ground he reached out and snared the ball before absorbing another big green blow – first down UMass.

That spectacular effort led to a touchdown but the meaning of that catch might run even deeper in the coming weeks. When the freshman drops back, with defenders in his eyes, who will he look for? Who else but No. 9.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Things may seem a little more dramatic today, than you had expected – and this is all because your own outlook may require adjusting.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You don't know all the answers, but you may be surprisingly close to the most elusive of them.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You're likely to receive praise from someone who not only admires you, but whom you also admire in equal measure.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You're not about to fall for any complicated psychological "mumbo-jumbo" today. As far as you're concerned, the truth is plain and simple.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – A little gamble can pay off handsomely today, but you've got to know the odds. Take care that you're not pursuing the impossible.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Don't break a promise to a new friend – or he or she isn't likely to become an old friend! Be true to your word at all times.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Let someone close to you know how much he or she means to you today; now isn't the time to take anyone for granted.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – The sooner you admit your failures the sooner your triumphs will begin to pay off. You can't have it both ways. Be realistic.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You mustn't expect others to react to your own behavior today in ways that might be out of character. You can trust that most will be fair with you.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Concentrate on those things that "speak" to you in a language that only you can understand. Internal rhythms may be changing at this time.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Take care that you don't embarrass anyone unintentionally. Intentionally it's not such a good idea either – but you can be humorous about it!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – The more objective you can be about your own affairs today, the more likely you are to escape any uncomfortable developments after dark. Avoid making harsh judgements.

Redshirt-freshman QB Matt Guice kept his composure against Division I-A foe Marshall Saturday night in Huntington, W.V.

Stampede stalled

Minutemen prove true test for I-A Marshall

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

HUNTINGTON, W.V. – Marshall's brand new Daktronics Video Scoreboard was tested early and often as the Herd thundered past the Minutemen of Massachusetts for a 49-20 victory Saturday evening.

Although the box score alluded to a 29-point blowout, mere statistics could do nothing but scratch the surface of a contest with many storylines.

From Amherst, MA to Huntington, WV supposed college football experts billed the Marshall(I-A)-UMass(I-AA) matchup as a massacre waiting to happen. And with freshman quarterback Matt Guice coming into the game with only one collegiate start (a 31-10 loss to William & Mary a week earlier) and 79 total passing yards, who would argue.

The fact is that if this game was supposed to be a slaughtering then nobody told the Minutemen, and judging by the perspiration stains on Herd coach Bob Pruett's polo shirt, he wasn't buying into the hype either.

UMass shocked and silenced the 35,000 strong at Marshall Stadium by scoring two straight touchdowns to end the first half and bringing the once laughable count (28-7) to a more reasonable eight point deficit.

The human bowling ball, Omari Howard (5-8, 215 lbs.), got the scoring started as he capped off a marathon (6:49) 17-play, 76-yard drive with a 1 yard run to paydirt.

After Doran Davis pressured MU signal caller Byron Leftwich into a fumble, the Minutemen took over with 49 seconds left and 34 yards between them and a one score-ball time deficit.

A remarkable catch by DeShon Hardy gave UMass a 1st-and-goal on the two, but less than ten seconds remained on the clock. Guice then took matters into his clammy but prepared hands. The freshman took the snap and was almost immediately pressured by an onslaught of green mesh. Quick to react, Guice showed poise and an improved football I.Q. by embarrassing the first rusher and shooting the seam to the endzone – 28-20, Marshall.

Unfortunately for the Maroon and White, superior talent prevailed after halftime as the Herd reeled off three straight scores with no answer from the UMass offense.

Leftwich, who coach Mark Whipple calls "a legit Heisman contender," exploded out of the gates, hitting stud flanker Darrius Watts with a 48-yard reception on the Herd's first offensive possession of the half.

"You can't let Leftwich sit back there, but if you blitz him than they get Watts in single coverage and we don't have anyone that can cover him. He's a pro," coach Mark Whipple said.

That play set up a Watts touchdown that extended the MU lead to 15.

After another UMass drive stalled out near midfield, Leftwich went to work again hitting Denero Marriott on a 10-yard TD pass to cap off a 6-play, 61-yard drive.

Despite Leftwich's adroitness in the air the catalyst for coach Pruett's offense was running back Trod Buggs.

Buggs, who replaced starter Chanston Rogers early in the game, ran roughshod over the UMass defense, piling up 128 yards on only 12 carries.

The Maroon and White had no answer for Buggs, as he keyed the Herd offense to a 49 point explosion.

With the game well out of reach, Butkus Award candidate Max Yates and the Herd defense stymied the UMass attack for the remainder of the game.

Even with the large scoring margin shown, as the final whistled sounded, there is no reason for this out skilled and under talented UMass squad to hang its collective head.

"Our guys hung in there and they fought back," Whipple said. "I was really proud of them."

The Minutemen exploded onto the scene and played with a high quality Marshall team for longer than anybody expected. In front of a hostile crowd in a city seemingly built on the foundation of football, UMass left its guts on the field and undoubtedly left a lasting impression on the pigskin adoring town of Huntington, West Virginia.

Hardy, Guice make connection

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

HUNTINGTON, W.V. – The Man. The go-to guy. Every good team has at least one. Great teams may have more. But last week against William & Mary, the Massachusetts football team had zero.

"Nobody made plays for us on offense," coach Mark Whipple said after his team received a 31-10 drubbing at the hands of the Tribe.

A lot can change in seven days, a lot indeed. More work ethic than work excellence, wide receiver DeShon Hardy stepped up and had a year (in 2000 (27 catches), but on Saturday night against division I-A Marshall, he had a coming out party.

"It just goes to show you how important one great receiver is to an offense," Whipple said of Marshall's all-world receiver Darius Watts. But he might as well been talking about his own brand new playmaker in Hardy.

The senior wide out totaled four catches for 90 yards and a touchdown, but more importantly he wore the mantle of security blanket for budding frosh signal caller Matt Guice.

Volleyball sweeps UMass invitational

By Andy Vogt
Collegian Staff

Facing its next seven matches away from the friendly confines of Curry Hicks Cage, the Massachusetts women's volleyball team looked to have a strong showing as it hosted the UMass Invitational this weekend. While not always pretty, the team's consistent attack ultimately got the job done.

The Minutewomen polished off the rest of the tournament field en route to a 3-0 finish, improving their record to 9-2 on the young season. Dartmouth, Buffalo and New Hampshire entertained thoughts of knocking off their host, but were all shut down by powerful offensive and defensive efforts by a number of different players.

"I thought Celia Wiste, Lauren Vander Veen, and Janeen DeMarte hit very well all weekend," head coach Bonnie Kenny said. "For us, we're pretty versatile offensively."

The Maroon and White got off to a rocky start, however, in its first match against Dartmouth on Friday night. The Big Green came out of the gates strong, forcing UMass into a series of errors and quickly building a 9-2 lead. After a Vander Veen kill cut the lead to 9-4, Dartmouth went on another run, stretching the margin to 15-4 before another Vander Veen kill stopped the bleeding. The Minutewomen seemed to get their act together at this point, but could not recover fully in losing the first game, 21-30.

"I told them that they might as well just forget about that first game, because they couldn't have played any worse," said Kenny.

Kenny's advice worked, as the Maroon and White gained momentum once the second game started, and its offense began to come alive. With the home team ahead by a single point at 21-20, the Minutewomen pulled away with an offensive flurry, highlighted by three kills each from DeMarte and sophomore Nitia Small in winning the second game 30-21. The third and fourth games saw much of the same, as UMass took both games 30-22, and 30-21, respectively.

The team stymied the Dartmouth attack, never allowing them to rally off more than three points in a row. Meanwhile, the UMass offense was able to mount an inspired attack after the first game, led by 18 total kills by DeMarte and 15 by Vander Veen. Senior Lymarie Llovet also contributed 14 kills for the Minutewomen, and junior Iitka Stehnova racked up 59 assists in the match.

Saturday afternoon saw UMass tackle the Bulls from the University of Buffalo, with similar results. The Minutewomen emerged victorious 3-1 (30-21, 25-30, 30-23, 30-18) behind more strong play from Vander Veen, DeMarte, and Llovet. DeMarte and Llovet each finished with 17 kills, while Vander Veen chipped in with 14 for the

Deren strike puts Terriers to rest

Men's soccer needs 2 OTs to beat B.U.

By Katie Landers
Collegian Staff

In a duel, advantage is given to the side with the faster draw. But that's not the case when it comes to overtime soccer.

In extra time, quick erroneous drives can be fatal, as one simple counterattack can spell sudden death. In overtime soccer, it's not who shoots first, but who shoots last.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team shot down Boston University yesterday with a Jeff Deren strike in sudden-death double overtime for a 2-1 victory and its first home win of the season.

B.U.	1

The victory over the Terriers came after one hour and fifty minutes on the pitch.

The Maroon and White scrambled from the start of overtime, firing three shots at the net in the first minute. A bicycle kick by Deren drew murmured appreciation from the crowd but did not impress B.U. as the fired ball sailed just over the net. A scuffle at the end of the first overtime kept tensions high between the teams and B.U. net-minder Matt Smith threatened Bryan O'Quinn that he could take care of his issues.

The Minutemen responded during Act IV when Deren came flying through the left side of the field, aimed the ball at the right post and hit target.

Head Coach Sam Koch described Deren after the game to be a tough player who just keeps on fighting.

"We owe a lot of credit to him," Koch said.

Dan Colwell played strong at midfield, moving the ball forward during key plays that could have advanced the Minutemen. Colwell was able to get behind the defense while still making good tackles. Koch claimed his throw-in also to be a weapon for the team.

UMass came back from a slow start to keep up and push past the Terriers. Koch told his team that it would have to move past the defense of B.U. to get the job done. Koch contributed the slow start to partial strategy.

"We were able to see what they (B.U.) were doing, and then we adjusted," Koch said.

The Minutemen were without key player J.R. Pouncey in the sweeper spot. Pouncey was restricted to the sideline after pulling his left groin muscle during the 2-1 loss at the University of Hartford last Wednesday. Though not ready to risk further injury Sunday, Pouncey will return in better health Friday for the Siena match-up.

John Lytton moved from the center midfield position to sweeper to make-up for the loss of the tri-captain starter. Pouncey said that he didn't think the team was hurt with his absence.

Residence Halls have been swamped with students, with many lounges being converted to triples to house the overflow.

Student body swells yet again

Yearly numbers crunch felt in dorms, classrooms

By Shawn Ilinitch
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is taking steps to accommodate a larger class of students as well as larger returning classes this year.

According to a press release issued by the UMass News Office, the incoming class is estimated at 4,224 students. In addition, the retention rate this year is 80 percent, which is higher than in past years.

"More students are choosing to attend UMass, and more students are finding it to be a good fit once they come to campus," said Javier Cevallos, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life.

The large number of students has forced Housing Services to guarantee housing only to freshmen and sophomores.

Many transfer students were notified in June that the University could not offer them housing.

These students, as well as students who live less than 40 miles from the school, were offered a first-priority housing assignment and a $500 reduction in their housing fee for the Spring semester.

In addition, several Resident Assistants have agreed to share a double room with students who applied for housing.

Even students who received housing assignments did not necessarily get rooms. Two hundred and forty-eight students are housed in hotels, including the Campus Center Hotel, University Motor Lodge and the Howard Johnson Inn.

Three hundred and twenty-seven students are in temporary spaces in residence halls, 100 of which were newly created this summer. For the most part, these temporary rooms are converted lounges.

According to David Vaillancourt, Assistant Director of Housing Services for Housing Assignments, "We're continuing to monitor incoming applications, and are actively managing assignments, cancellations, exemptions, and academic withdrawals, to assist all students who have applied for housing."

In addition to the steps taken to address housing concerns, the University is adding more classes, and hiring additional teaching assistants and lecturers.

According to John Cunningham, Deputy Provost, additional classes in the general education requirements have been added as well as more sections of freshman mathematics and non-major computer science classes.

Additional classes have also been added in majors experiencing a heavy demand, such as economics and legal studies.

Qualified teaching assistants and part-time lecturers are being hired to teach these additional classes.

Facts and Figures

According to a UMass press release, the estimated incoming class this year is 4,224 students, up from last year's entering class of 3,730. The number of applications decreased from 19,500 to 18,365, while the average weighted grade-point average rose from 3.33 last year to 3.5 this year.

The average student in this year's incoming class ranked in the top 25th percentile of their high school class and had combined SAT scores of 1,118.

The total number of undergraduates is expected to be between 18,300 and 18,400, while the number of graduate students is expected to be 5,300 students.

The incoming class for the Commonwealth College, the University's honors college, is estimated at 515. The weighted grade-point average is 4.0, and the students rank in the top five percent of their class.

There will be 2,100 students in the Commonwealth College this fall.

The total cost of tuition, fees, room, and board for in-state students increased 2.2 percent to $10,527 from last year's cost of $10,107. Out of state tuition, fees, room, and board rose 2.8 percent to $18,880 from $18,360 from last year.

Yoga and Meditation Club to host Patel

Rajshree Patel doesn't want her pupils to worry about yesterday's disasters or tomorrow's possibilities.

"She wants you to live in the present moment," Rashmi Sheel said. Sheel, with the UMass Yoga and Meditation Club, brings Patel to UMass tonight in room 904 of the Campus Center. Patel will present a lecture entitled "Living in the Present Moment."

"We get so bogged down by the past and our future," Sheel said. The Amherst resident added that Patel wants individuals to live "100 percent for the present moment." Patel will show audience members how that ability might be achieved through meditation, 'de-stress' techniques, yoga and a breathing technique called sudarshan kriya.

Patel is a stress management expert and a personal development consultant. She has presented workshops at universities, and perhaps most notably, at the United Nations. She is a senior teacher at the Art of Living Foundation, founded by Sri Sri Ravi Shankar. Shankar was renowned for connections to the Beatles of musical fame. Patel has taught classes in 35 countries, including Italy, India, Brazil and Japan. She is currently offering workshops in both Cambridge and Chelmsford and will later teach a regular class in Amherst. It will begin to meet on September 27.

Sheel said this was the first time that Patel has been to the local area, although she had been in Boston before.

The event is free to the public. The UMass Yoga and Meditation Club offers events on a regular basis to all interested parties. For more information, visit the club website at www-unix.oit.umass.edu/~asi/yoga.

Bridgewater reaches out to gay students

By Jake Ulken
Collegian Staff

Gay and lesbian college students have often lived in fear of "coming out" to their parents, especially when they rely on them for payment of their college tuitions. It is not uncommon for outraged parents to cut their children off financially upon learning that they are gay.

It is for this reason that Bridgewater State University is offering the Frank-Tremblay Safe Colleges Scholarship for gay and lesbian students. The scholarship will be open to students whose families have refused to fund their educations.

The program came about after an April 2000 meeting, in which Bridgewater State's Outreach Education Coordinator, Bob Haynor, met with GLBT students who had been denied tuition money after coming out. Haynor immediately began raising funds.

"It's more than just money," Haynor said. "I think it's somebody saying, 'we want you to be here.'"

The scholarship is named after openly gay U.S. Congressional Representative Barney Frank (D-Newton), who represents Bridgewater State's district, and lesbian folk singer Lucie Blue Tremblay. Tremblay is a donor for the scholarship fund.

Frank has openly supported the program, saying, "The potential for rejection or the fact of rejection is a crushing blow. Add to that an inability to continue your education...obviously we wish this situation didn't happen, but it's important to have this resource available."

Not all are happy with the program, however. Brian Camenker, president of the Newton-based Parents' Rights Coalition, called the scholarship "a complete outrage," saying that it strips parents of their rights.

"[You're] essentially spitting in parents' faces," he said.

The size of the scholarships has yet to be determined. Tuition and fees at Bridgewater State cost $2,800. Approximately $8,200 has been raised for the scholarship fund thus far.

School officials expect the amount given by private donors to be matched by the state. The scholarship is part of the Bridgewater State College Foundation, which receives public funding.

Million-dollar bike trail set to be blazed

In an effort to increase the area's bikeways, the Mass Highway Commissioner Matthew J. Amorello announced the acquisition of a 3.1-mile railroad right of way at a cost of $214,145. The acquisition is part of the Franklin County Bikeway Project.

Three and one-tenth miles of abandon railroad from Unity Park in Turners Falls to East Deerfield is considered Phase I of the Franklin County Bikeway. Construction is slated to begin in the spring of 2002. An estimated $1.2 million has been set aside for the project. It is to be advertised for construction bids later this fall.

The Swift Administration has dedicated more than $60 million so far to the construction, development and design of bicycle projects in the state of Massachusetts.

"The Swift Administration is committed to improving bicycle facilities by supporting the construction of bike paths and bikeways that provide an alternative means of transportation and help improve the quality of life for our citizens," Commissioner Amorello said in a recent press release. "This project is one of over 90 separate projects for bicyclists now under construction or in development."

So far the in Hampshire County/Franklin County regions there are several bikeways, including the paved Norwattuck Rail Trail that runs from Amherst into Northampton. Unpaved bike trails are also available for recreation and located all over the area, including Amethyst Brook, and the Upper Robert Frost Trail.

For more information regarding the Franklin County Bikeway Project and its construction, please contact Doug Cope at (617) 973-7889 or Steve Young at (617) 973-7817. Oregon- The city of Portland has set up a temporary tent city for its homeless residents. The homeless refuge is a stretch of paved land set between the city's leaf composting operation and an airport runway.

Residents of the tent city call it 'Dignity Village' and bring with them tents, backpacks, some furniture, and whatever other belongings they can carry. Though most of the people in the Village are single men, there are women, couples and even pets.

This is the fifth site of the Village, and the only officially sanctioned site so far. Members of the Dignity Village have set up tent cities in other parts of the city, including under a highway bridge, but have been kicked out of the location for trespassing.

However, now after suffering harassment by private landowners and the government, the Portland city council has voted 4 to 1 to negotiate with the urban campers in Dignity Village some sort of one-year contract that would allow the tent city to remain functioning at a yet undetermined site as long as the encampment could prove that it could "meet the needs of homeless people and help them move to more appropriate housing."

Many of the homeless have commented that they prefer to live in the tent city than to be forced into shelters that are seen as oppressive, limited and isolating. Most shelters do not accept pets and have strict rules about meal times, behavior, belongings and scheduling.

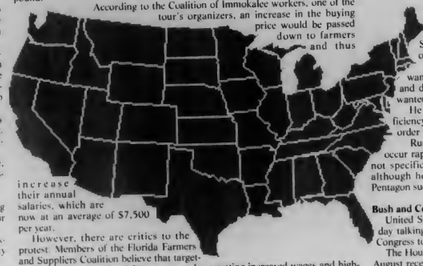
The city of Portland has set up sanitation and water facilities in the Village, but the city remains that the encampment is strictly temporary. It has not disclosed plans for moving the tent city at this point.

California- 20-year-old Joseph Ferguson shot himself early Monday morning after a long and drawn-out run-in with Sacramento police that ended in a car wreck and two officers being shot.

Police were in pursuit of Ferguson after he killed five people over the weekend, including his ex-girlfriend and several employees of the Burns Security Company that had recently laid him off.

Late Saturday night, police were called to an equipment yard where they discovered the bodies of Ferguson's 20-year-old ex-girlfriend and a 32-year-old female, both had on Burns Security uniforms.

Half an hour later the police discovered two more bodies at a marina 10 miles away. The bodies were of men aged 19 and 48, one dressed in a Burns Security uniform, the other was thought to be a marina employee. Both men were shot several times.



The systematic rampage continued when police arrived several hours later to the Sacramento Zoo where they discovered yet another Burns Security employee handcuffed. Ferguson had stolen her 1992 Toyota Tercel.

The next evening a man identified as Ferguson's supervisor was shot after being kidnapped. The police responded to the incident after the victim's wife called 911. Ferguson had ditched the Toyota and taken his supervisor's Nissan Altima.

Police spotted Ferguson on Monday and began to chase him. At that point over $130,000 had been offered up as reward for any information leading to his arrest. Ferguson was unwilling to surrender to police and engaged them in a gory shoot-out in which a California Highway Patrol Officer and another civilian were shot: one in the arm, the other in the abdomen. Eventually Ferguson shot himself.

Florida- farmers and tomato growers in South Florida are taking on fast food paradigm Taco Bell in the "Taco Bell Truth Tour."

Farmers are attacking the restaurant, accusing it of treating the tomato growers as sweatshop workers, and demanding wage increases and price hikes. Right now Taco Bell is buying 32-pound bushels of tomatoes for 47-50 cents each. Farmers would like to see the chain increase their buying price by a penny a pound.

However, there are critics to the protest. Members of the Florida Farmers and Suppliers Coalition believe that targeting Taco Bell is not the right way to go about getting increased wages and higher prices for their tomatoes.

According to a spokesman from the Coalition, Taco Bell is just another business trying to get their supplies at the lowest prices, and that it is actually other factors that keep prices and wages down. The spokesman also said that the Tour can picket all of the Taco Bells in the country but it still wouldn't do much.

Taco Bell spokespeople have only commented that the company believes the issue to be one of labor, and will not intervene on either side of the struggle.

The tour stops include Chicago, Atlanta, Denver and Los Angeles. Previously, farmers had picketed in front of Florida Governor Jeb Bush's house. Bush had originally promised farmers price increases of five percent per barrel, but now refuses to intervene, calling it a labor issue.

Alaska- Salmon are glowing in the dark, according to The Alaska Fish and Game Department. A fish pathologist discovered the cause of the eerie glow to be a phosphorescent marine bacterium.

Residents of Holy Cross, a Yupik Eskimo village discovered that their fish were glowing in a neighborhood smokehouse. At first they wondered if the glowing was due to nuclear contamination. However, after a sample was sent from Holy Cross to biologists in Juneau, the real cause was determined.

Pathologists from the United States Fish and Wildlife Department in conjunction with the Alaska Fish and Game Department believe that the bacteria is spread over the fish and is probably more common than people realize, however, few people notice the glow due to the lack of darkness during the summer in Alaska.

It has yet to be determined whether or not it is truly safe to eat the luminescent fish, however, so far there haven't been any incidents of illness.

Political Roundup

Defense Secretary despises bureaucracy

According to the Washington Post, the United States Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld reportedly declared war on the bureaucracy in the Pentagon.

In a speech he gave on Monday, Rumsfeld declared that he wanted to combine some military and civilian staffs, cut some staffs and duplicate jobs in two or more departments. He also stated that he wanted to see a 15 percent cut in Pentagon's headquarter's staff by 2003.

He then went on to condemn the evils of bloated bureaucracy and inefficiency and stated that he wanted to cut the administrative budget in order to secure every last dollar he can for the military.

Rumsfeld said that he understood that changes this massive could not occur rapidly, but set a goal of eight years to get the process going. He was not specific about how he was going to go about implementing his plan, although he did mention that hiring the private sector to do jobs in the Pentagon such as housekeeping and payroll paperwork.

Bush and Congress battle over education

United States President George W. Bush was in Jacksonville, Florida yesterday talking about education. The President has renewed his campaign to get Congress to agree on a plan.

The House and Senate representatives worked toward an agreement over the August recess and have yet to hammer out the last remaining differences, however, progress is being made and an outcome is expected soon.

Meanwhile, Bush has been traveling around Florida, and in some instances accompanied by his brother, Florida Governor Jeb Bush, to try and pump up his education plan, which calls for annual standardized testing for grades third through eighth.

Bush also calls for massive reforms to the educational system, rather than increased funding. The Democrats have pushed for a bill increasing educational spending to $32 billion, while the Republicans would only like to spend $23 billion.

Bush has had education high on his priority list and would like to see his package of reforms become the cornerstone of his administration. He also listed ending illiteracy as one of his goals for education reform. Monday he spoke to an elementary school in Jacksonville and will be speaking to another school in Sarasota, Florida, later this week.

So far there is no word on Bush's stand on collegiate spending or higher education reforms.

BU questions 'Best Colleges' list

By Rachel Beard
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON - If one were to reference the new U.S. News and World Report "America's Best Colleges" index, a high schooler looking to apply to the number one college in the nation this year would seek acceptance at Princeton University.

For those willing to settle for less than top 50, Boston University may be the place to be.

BU once again failed to make the Report's list of Top 50 American colleges and universities this year, instead finding placement alongside 77 other schools in Tier 2, the unnumbered level just beneath the selected elite schools.

Regardless of their rank, BU students may yet have reason to boast of their school.

According to statements made in a recent Washington Post article by Amy Graham, the U.S. News and World Report's former director of data research, the magazine's rankings are utterly irrelevant.

In the article, Graham claimed the magazine's approach to ranking schools is biased and fails to address the bottom line – student learning.

Graham said current methods used by the magazine, including comparing faculty salaries (7 percent of a school's score) and having university deans and presidents rank other schools (25 percent), are poor indicators of the amount of learning that goes on at a college.

Rather, she suggested surveying college students and evaluating the number of hours students spend engaged with faculty in place of test scores.

Richard Folkers, director of media relations for the Report, conceded to some of Graham's arguments, but countered that her suggestions wouldn't have the effect she says they would.

"I'm not going to get into an argument with the Washington Post," says Richard Folkers, director of Media Relations at U.S. News and World Report. "There were a lot of valid points in that article. The problem is that the alternatives suggested do not cover all college campuses."

Graham added that top-ranked schools are ones the public expects to see, as well as ones where magazine editors received their degrees.

Said Folkers, "I'm not even going to dignify favoring where editors got their degrees with a response."

The magazine judges undergraduate schools in seven general categories: academic reputation, retention, faculty resources, student selectivity, financial resources, alumni giving and graduation rate performance. These categories are broken into 16 sub-categories, including SAT/ACT scores and average class size, with each category weighted.

Harvard University, which tied Yale University for second place, said it is indifferent to such rankings.

"We don't have an opinion when the reports come out, no matter where Harvard falls on the list," said Rebecca Rowlands, associate director of the News and Public Affairs Office at Harvard.

The Report's Web site tells students that "researching the intangibles and mulling over your own needs are very important aspects of the process of choosing a college" and to "use the rankings as one tool to select and compare schools."

"We don't feel that students should pick a school based on a ranking," Folkers said. "You should pick a school that is right for you."

Folkers said he isn't worried that students will let the rankings drive their decision making.

"Students are pretty smart about this," he said. "They're contemplating what goes into the rankings."

Even Princeton officials dissuade applicants from focusing too much on the rankings.

"We hope that people are choosing Princeton because they've determined that this is the place that suits their needs, not because of any rankings system," said Maryland Marks, media relations manager at Princeton. "We appreciate the recognition but do share concerns about the methodology involved."

Yale student missing in South Africa

By Matthew Ferraro
The Yale Herald (Yale U.)

(U-WIRE) NEW HAVEN, Conn. - With her daughter Natasha Smalls, home after disappearing five weeks ago in South Africa, Glory Smalls has publicly criticized Yale University for not doing enough to find her 20-year-old daughter, who was studying at the University of Natal in Durban, South Africa. Glory Smalls has also blamed racism for what she sees as the U.S. State Department's lackadaisical approach to the case.

Natasha Smalls' whereabouts were unknown from Aug. 1 until she telephoned home on Aug. 23. With the help of friends in Johannesburg and Durban, she boarded a plane and returned to New York on Aug. 27. A friend of Natasha Smalls who helped her prepare for the flight from Durban reported that she was disturbed and incoherent.

At an early-morning press conference at John F. Kennedy International Airport on the day of her return, Glory Smalls criticized Yale's lack of supervision of study-abroad programs.

"When Yale sends students to a different country, they should be more involved in it," she said. "And they were not — at all. Yale didn't know anything about what Natasha was doing."

Her daughter was not present at the press conference.

The University does not directly supervise programs like the one in which Natasha Smalls participated. Students must petition Yale to grant them credit for their overseas work and then pay their tuition directly to the hosting University. Robert Smalls, Natasha's father, added, "The laws and regulations [governing study abroad programs] need to be looked into."

Yale president Richard Levin defended Yale's actions by saying that the University worked hard to try to locate her. He told the Herald, "When students go abroad, they're going largely alone. Yale doesn't make an attempt to monitor their actions. That said, if a Yale student is in distress, we will do everything we can to help them."

In late July, before her disappearance, Natasha Smalls called home and said she was being held in a Zimbabwean psychiatric hospital and injected with chemicals against her will. While local South African authorities have challenged the veracity of her claims, Candace Sandy, Communications Director for U.S. Representative Gregory Meeks (D-N.Y.), who assisted the Smalls family, said Natasha's story is true.

"We actually have proof that she was in a hospital in Zimbabwe," Sandy said.

She refused to divulge the source of that evidence.

Meeks' office is reluctant to defend either Yale's actions or condone Glory Smalls' statements.

At the press conference, however, Meeks said, "We need to look and see whether Yale did or did not participate as they should. I believe the University does have some responsibility."

Several days later, Sandy reiterated that "our main concern was to get Natasha home."

Levin said, "I know as soon as the University learned that Natasha Smalls was missing, we sprung into action, and there was quite a concerted effort on our part to find her."

Because of phone calls Yale made to contacts, the State Department became involved. Sandra Sanneh, a senior lecturer in the African Studies department, extended her visit to South Africa to accompany Natasha Smalls home, Levin added.

Meeks' office also notified the State Department, agencies within South Africa, the American Ambassador to South Africa, and Natasha Smalls' friends in an attempt to find out where she was. It is unclear whether any of these efforts were successful in tracking her down or uncovering what happened to her while she was missing. Her phone call home was a welcomed, if unexpected, break in the case.

"We're still trying to piece together what happened to her," Sandy said. "But Natasha holds the key."

WELCOME BACK TO THE TOWN OF AMHERST

We always enjoy the slower pace of a summer in Amherst. But university and college students are what make Amherst a great place to live, work and play, and we welcome you back to our town – our town and your town.

Relations between the Town and the University are good, and University students continue to play a big part in that relationship. Students have always provided many volunteer services, both as individuasl and in small and large groups. Student firefighters and EMTs have provided vital services to the town for many years, and an expanded student force is helping us meet increasing demands for service. The annual, spring "Into Amherst" day has been the most visible way for large numbers of students to provide services to the town you live in. We love the Community Service Learning program. And there are other student services too numerous to mention. Thank you for your services to the town.

The Community Partnership on alcohol-related issues includes representatives of students, landlords, officials of the Town and the educational institutions, and other citizens, anbd it continues to monitor those issues. We hope that students can enjoy college life without frequent or serious alcohol-related incidents.

We again want to give you a "heads up" about parking in and around downtown Amherst. Our parking garage is under construction, so downtown parking will be difficult during your first semester. We continue to take steps to make more parking available to meet the needs of downtown customers. At the same time, our parking enforcement officers are charged with the responsibility of enforcing parking regulations. Be aware that the fine for parking in a handicapped space or discharge lane has been increased to $100. Please abide by parking regulations and respect the job that the parking enforcment officers must do. Or use the buses that your student fees pay for, or use the new bicycle lanes and racks downtown.

Thanks again for being part of the Town of Amherst, and have a good year.

No alibi:
U-Ugly

Much has been made of our campus "ugliness." From the newest freshman to the veteran professor, few would disagree that parts our university is lacking sorely in the aesthetics department. We've been called "unsightly" in the Princeton Review. Our campus ugliness, so to speak, has been the topic of countless ed-op columns and the butt of many jokes for years.

Maybe its time we do something about it. Obviously, some things cannot be changed. The Fine Arts Center has had and will always have one of the funkiest architectural layouts known to modern man. The landscaping at times is hit or miss. Campus construction puts a damper on the way things look, and there's nothing that any of us can do about it. These are things that we all have to just grin and bear – they were all a part of the university when we chose it.

Other things can be changed, though. Just because we attend this university does not give us rights to destroy the place. Our status as students here does not give us the right to destroy campus property, deface buildings, and leave stuff behind for others to pick up, or otherwise devalue the look of our campus.

We all have obligations. We as students owe it to one another to treat our UMass world with respect. We all live here, and we have to share. Wrecking things that others must use and live with is disrespectful, unfair, and inconsiderate. We're not just sabotaging our own stuff; we're sabotaging everyone's.

So what can we do? Treat UMass like you would treat your home. Because right now, it is your home. It sounds pretty simple, but it is something that many of us pay by the wayside while the parties brew and we lose our sanity. Creaky doors off the hinges, smashed windows, puke-stained walls – these are things that we shouldn't be blaming administration for, but blaming ourselves for. The window that is punched through on Saturday night, the door that got kicked in – maybe that is because so many students treat so much of this campus the same way.

Anyone that takes that pleasant walk from the UMass campus into Amherst center walks through frat row, blessed frat row. Anyone that walks through frat row knows that frat row needs to be cleaned up. Fraternity parties are obviously a rite of passage at the University of Massachusetts, but it does not give students the right to wreck a neighborhood. After each fraternity party, the place should be cleaned up. Beer bottles, cans and cups – none of them belong adorning the bushes, lawns, and curbsides that they end up decorating. We're better than that.

It's not just the frats, either. They should not take all the blame. Our campus is filled with broken class every Friday, Saturday, and Sunday morning for no other reason than many people think breaking beer bottles is funny. While the glass breaking probably is comedy at three in the morning, people walking on it in sandals the next day at noon really isn't.

Each and every one of us spends too much time walking this campus for it to be unsightly. A cleaner campus shows the outside world that we have the respect for ourselves and for one another that we all should.

So how was your summer?
Looking past the well-worn question

MELODY ZAGAMI

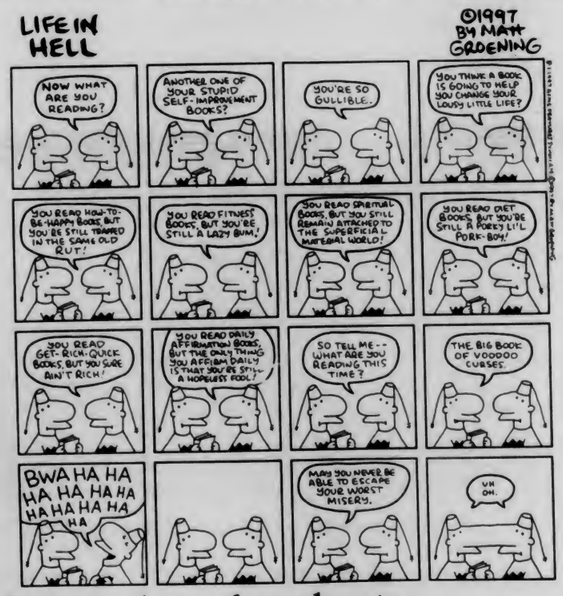
"Hey, how was your summer?" Turn to the kid next to you in class and ask him that. Stop the girl outside the Campus Center puffing on a butt and ask her. There are quite a few responses to this age-old question. Of course, those answers will vary based on how well you know the person. If you're a good friend you might say, "OH MY GOD tell me all about your summer!?!?" You can have fun with your responses too: "My summer? My summer was great...my dog died and Mariah Carey had a breakdown. Any more questions or can I spiral further downward into my depression now?" Or (and this is my favorite) ask if they really even care how you're summer was or are they just wasting your time with the obligatory post-summer small talk.

The case is usually the latter and, sadly, we all fall victim to it and will continue to do so for the remainder of September. So to save you the trouble of asking me how my summer was, because I know you all care a great deal, I'll help you out. What did our columnist Melody Zagami do with her break? Fear not, reader friend, I had a fantastic summer. A summer full of lemonade peddling, Bomb Pops and chronic poison ivy. Wait, wait. That was when I was twelve.

This, the summer of 2001, was my last summer of freedom. I am now a senior, who will go forth into the "real world" in May and immediately join the throngs of unemployed college graduates. It was my last summer to sleep until two and be a professional baby-sitter. It was the last time I'll have to be on the lawn at Allmans surrounded by thousands of area high-schoolers who have never even heard of the band. It was probably the last time that I'll go without having a shred of responsibility but, it was the first time I've ever gone to Spain.

The Spanish Department here at our esteemed place of higher learning has a program during the summer. The program is called, quite appropriately, The Salamanca Summer Program, because you go to Salamanca, Spain in July. Are you still with me? It's simple: I had two more semesters of Spanish to take and instead of spending two semesters in a dusty, crowded room in Herter at 9:05, 10:10, or 11:15 (you know the 12:20's full) I spent it in a beautiful city, with incredible individuals and limitless opportunities to have a good time. The catch is that you have to go to class. The academic component scared me. I have taken Spanish before, but what if it was too difficult or the other kids were all fluent and going to laugh at me because I only know "hola" and "Como estas?" Chances are the other kids will laugh at me anyway, in any given dialect, and anyways, I'd gotten decent grades in all my previous Spanish classes.

I left on August 30th and returned on July 31st and kids, can I just tell you, that if there is anything you do for yourself in your time here, spend a little not being here. The Salamanca trip is a month abroad. It isn't a whole semester, it isn't even a half a semester; It's just right. There is nothing more educational or personally fulfilling as being away from home. Being in another country, away from the United States, away from our media, and far from our popular culture is an awakening experience. I was a self- proclaimed media junkie. I like to have MSNBC up on my laptop, a New York Times on the table and a television set on at all times, just so I didn't miss anything. That was the pre-Salamanca Mel. But now, I'm a new person. I didn't watch any television for a month (except for an episode of Dawson's Creek in Spanish and yes, it's crappiness transcends language barriers, and Spanish National Geographic on a TV in a cafe once. I can now recount the mating habits of lions, in Spanish).



I saw no MTV; I listened to no radio. I had no MSNBC, CBS, ABC or Bloomberg. I couldn't pick up a TIME, a Newsweek or a People and I'm a better person for it. I spent a month in a city where the elderly go to nightclubs and sit in the town plaza, singing and drinking until two a.m. I lived between a beautiful cathedral and a university where students have studied since the 1200s. In Spain they spend the hours between two and five resting, having lunch or spending time with loved ones. In Europe time is on a whole different schedule. You are never pressed to be somewhere at a particular time, you can stroll from place to place and you cannot get a coffee "to go" anywhere. Life is much less stressful, much more relaxing. I've always been pretty patient, but I'm even more so now. I don't mind waiting in lines, sitting in traffic or being late.

> "I saw no MTV, I listened to no radio. I had no MSNBC, CBS, ABC or Bloomberg. I couldn't pick up a TIME, a Newsweek or a People and I'm a better person for it."

When I arrived home I found out Ben Affleck was in rehab, an Intern was missing (still is), and MTV turned twenty and I realized how much I didn't care and how much it didn't matter. I also realized that my quest to make my final summer of freedom last forever was a fruitless one. You cannot stop time, but it is possible, at times, to slow it down.

So if you want to get away from it all, pick up another language, or perfect your tequila shot, I highly recommend the Salamanca Summer Program or any study abroad that puts you someplace different than a landscaping or waitressing job for the summer months. And when you return you'll have an interesting response to that eternal question from which you cannot escape: How was your summer?

Pondering the wonders of academia:
searching for a consistency in this modern age

GEORGE THOMAS

The wonders of academia never cease to amaze. Just recently I came face to face with the great academe bogeyman: liberalism. The liberal polity, I was told, with its belief in the natural freedom and equality of human beings, due process of law and tolerance, is intolerant. Now we need not deny that our history has been inextricably mixed up with racism, sexism and the like; it has. And those problems still persist. However, we would do well to remember that some of the most powerful arguments against these vices have come from the liberal tradition: indeed, liberalism itself has often led us to see the injustice of racism or sexism because such thinking treats people unequally, judging them not based on their character, but on irrational things like the color of their skin. This, though, only hits at the surface of their critique. All of these unacceptable vices – and they are surely that – are part of a whole and that whole is the liberal polity itself; liberalism, they say, by its very nature, is intolerant and thus fosters these very problems. Now this is a remarkable argument when you consider its source: university professors paid by the liberal state!

We were sitting in a room paid for by state dollars, where tenured faculty, making upwards of $70,000-$80,000 a year to teach two courses a semester, were attacking liberalism root and branch. I was somewhat struck by the vehemence of the feeling, especially as I considered its source. Now, if nothing else, it strikes me as pretty tolerant of the liberal state to fund its most vehement critics. And fund them well, so that they can drive expensive European sedans, live in nice homes, vacation abroad where everything is so much more civilized and spend their days reading, writing and teaching the sons and daughters of those who foot the bill that the society they live in is hopelessly intolerant. (Let us not dwell on the fact that so many of them are bad teachers and even less capable writers.) Ah, the vices of liberal capitalism. Only a rich and very tolerant society could afford such an indulgence. Perhaps all the immigrants trying to get into America to build prosperous lives for their children know something the professors don't. Now you'd think that such professors, being the deep thinkers that they are, would have to reconcile themselves to such contradictions. You'd be wrong. In fact, you'd have fallen for the very sins of liberalism and its colonizing tendencies. You probably believe that twice two is four.

You see, reason itself, it turns out, is an instrument of domination. By demanding that we engage in and give reasons, liberalism is once again acting intolerantly; indeed, by demanding "reasonableness" from people we're privileging a particular way of thinking and "colonizing" those cultures and individuals who'd rather not rely on reason; we're trying to tame the "other." It's not just that this gives hip academics a way out, so that they can decry liberal capitalism while living off that fat of the land. It's that true multiculturalism requires that we be open to all other cultures, even those, it turns out, that aren't particularly tolerant. The irony here is that such a demand for tolerance could only come from liberalism's universalistic aspirations. Radical multiculturalism is a product of liberal thinking – albeit liberal thinking run amok. In its way, lib-ralism does have "colonizing" tendencies in that it demands that all human beings, everywhere, are emitled to certain rights, which bumps up against cultures that deny such rights.

But this leaves us in a bind. When we call for multicultural tolerance, what do we do when religious fundamentalists in Iran condemn a writer like Salman Rushdie to death because he, ever so gently, had the audacity to criticize Islam in general and its revered leader in particular? (Let us put aside the fact that religious fundamentalism inside the United States is roundly criticized by academics, even if it is free to reign in cultures abroad, especially if it is "authentic".) Worse, Rushdie was very funny while doing so and, like good academics, the clerics had no sense of humor. Oddly, it was the "intolerant" liberal democracies of the West – Britain and the US in particular, the worst and whitest of these – who came to Rushdie's defense, speaking the language of free speech. Yet, being good multiculturalists, wouldn't we have to accept Iran's reaction? Not only does the Islamic state in Iran not believe in free speech, it doesn't believe in the separation of church and state. Too bad for Rushdie, but punishing blasphemy with death is an "authentic" response and represents the cultural view of at least some Muslims. Any appeal to human rights not only smacks of liberalism, isn't it an intolerant attempt to impose your cultural values on another people?

> "You see, reason itself, it turns out, is an instrument of domination. By demanding that we engage in and give reasons, liberalism is once again acting intolerantly..."

But then, I suppose that this too smacks of "colonization." I'm asking, after all, for a kind of consistency from multiculturalists. Thereby, I'm imposing my values on them. This, let us say, is just one of the many wonderful puzzles of a postmodern age. Witness the UN Conference on Racism in Durban, South Africa. There we had authoritarian Arab states lecturing Israel on human rights, while calling the Holocaust a "Jewish lie." When there's no such thing as truth, when reason is a vice – a project of "colonization" – there's no limit to the nonsense that can be put forward. And so Fidel Castro, speaking at this very conference – a man who locks people up and tortures them for no other reason than that they happen to be gay – is not derided in hip academic circles. Let us take solace in this: if any liberal thinker gives gay marriage a moment's pause, you can be sure that academics will rise up and point to this as further proof of liberalism's intolerance.

JANET JACKSON
Aug. 26

There are few superstars who can pack in thousands of adoring fans and serve up three decades worth of hits. Janet Jackson is one of those gifted performers.

Jackson has also been credited as being a perfectionist and putting out great music. It was obvious in Jackson's two-hour All for You show on August 26 that she had worked tirelessly to perfect every number to create an exhilarating night of entertainment. Even the hottest item of the night, a magazine/tour book, was put together with artistic genius. The book, copied in look from Janc magazine, spoofed everything from faux ads (including a six page spread of "Janet's Secret" lingerie) to 80's culture (Jackson sporting a revival punk look).

But before Jackson hit the stage, the audience had to endure the opening act, 112. The R&B quartet performed a lame half-hour set of bump-and-grind numbers, which barely evoked any enthusiasm from the audience. The same back and forth dance moves. Chippendale shirt ripping, floor humping, and the overused "throw your hands in the air" shtick magnified the fact that a well-bodied performer such as Jackson is truly a high-ranking talent.

Classic photos of the MTV icon flashed at an accelerating pace on a huge screen. The diva herself was unveiled behind the curtains standing atop one thin Romanesque 30-foot pedestal. The audience soaked up the arresting image of the well chiseled, yet petite, Jackson standing straight faced in sequined ivory pants and top, complete with a hat. A flattering choppy brown 'do with blond highlights brought out her most beautiful facial qualities. White lights pounded the stage as she was lowered, along with six dancers, and kicked off the action-filled night with the jungle drum rhythms of "Come On Get Up." Another dance ditty, "You Ain't Right" quickly followed. The stage then transformed, opening up the back wall to reveal three 25 X 10 foot video screens that remained lit for the rest of the evening, broadcasting crisp close-ups of the meticulously produced show.

One of the evening's most mesmerizing moments came out of nowhere, as dancers dressed in wacky Halloween-type garbs and masks bedecked the stage as the audience was drowned in the blaring "Trust a Try." The heavy guitar riffs visibly penetrated Jackson, clad in tight black garb, as she got on her knees.

COURTESY VIRGIN RECORDS

The excitement didn't wane when Jackson slowed down for two back-to-back medleys of some of her biggest hits, "Come Back to Me," "Let's Wait Awhile" and "Again." The mellow break allowed the audience to soak up a precious moment with one of the biggest superstars in the world, as she beautifully sang each number with the passion that helped each song become a huge hit.

Ripping a page out of the Cirque de Soleil book, Jackson went all out to create a stage look that created a spiritually uplifting atmosphere. The colorful set, complete with huge blocks thrown together to ever so boldly spell out SEX, set the stage for her to rip into another surprisingly cohesive medley consisting of "Runaway," "When I Think of You," "Miss You Much" and "Escapade." These beat-heavy pop hits made for exciting dance numbers and thrilling stage spectacles.

Jackson then transformed back into her aggressive persona, with a silver chain around her plaid red pants, during "Son of a Gun." Jackson hissed "Ha Ha/Hoo Hoo/Thought you'd get the money too/greedy mutherf——s/try to have your cake/and eat it too" as Carly Simon materialized on the video screens laughably name dropping cloud-formations.

"That's the Way Love Goes" created the same passionate "like a moth burning by the flame" ardor and intimacy of the video as Jackson sat in front of two back-up singers.

COURTESY VIRGIN RECORDS

Another medley worked in even more of her old hits, such as "What Have You Done for Me Lately," "Control" and "Nasty." Again, this medley worked like a jigsaw puzzle, connecting perfectly at every crevice and corner making it nearly impossible to notice the transitions between the songs.

The night's steamiest moment came during the performance of the lyrically raunchy "Would You Mind." Dressed like a dominatrix, Jackson slithered onstage in four-inch heels, as a T-shaped bed emerged beneath the smoky stage. After minutes of checking out male audience members, she selected a "victim" who was then strapped to the bed. Jackson cooed, "I just wanna kiss you, suck you, taste you" as she stroked and straddled the audience member.

In a stunning Japanese setting, Jackson performed the fast-paced "If" and "Black Cat," a standout number due to the heavy guitar playing. But just as soon as the song was wrapping up, pyrotechnics burst in the air, surprising audience members.

The military-style dark lighting, costumes, and dance moves from the "Rhythm Nation" video were translated onto the gigantic stage in perfect precision, creating the finest choreographed performance of the night.

Unfortunately, Jackson's singing was off key throughout several songs (especially during "Miss You Much") and she heavily relied on voice-overs. Her wispy voice didn't have the range to rise above the blaring guitars, which were a significant part of the show. But that delicate voice was ideal for the unplugged medley featuring "Come Back to Me" and "Again."

A particularly large stage allowed plenty of room for her elaborate dance numbers and set designs. Nine costumes and eight scrupulously choreographed dancers offered up plenty of eye candy. The blink-and-you-miss-it theatrics offered stunning visuals and plenty of theatrics throughout the entire 26-song list (a few of the songs were slightly reworked and given a more contemporary flavor).

From the colorful sets to the lively dancing, Jackson showed that she's currently enjoying a joyful high. Her happy spirit (only dampened when she sympathetically asked for a moment of silence in honor of Aaliyah, who died the previous day) and laid-back vibe of the show conveyed Jackson's passion of wanting her fans to have a good time without reading too much into the performance.

Meshing old and new hits, the pop icon showed that she's not afraid to relive her past and live in the present – evidence that she's matured into a woman. With several standing ovations lasting for minutes throughout the evening, it was clear the audience not only felt the diva's presence but also her ever-lasting devotion to good music.

Afroman – 'cause he got high.

Afroman makes Lil' Romeo look like Dr. Dre

By Kurt Polesky

AFROMAN
The Good Times
Universal Records

I remember it vividly. Driving at 6 a.m. to my job over the summer, hearing some song called "Because I Got High" on Howard Stern. It was explained that director Kevin Smith had included the song on the soundtrack to his latest film Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back. Seems as though the artist behind this masterpiece was a fledgling rapper by the name of Afroman.

A few plays on Stern, then Top 40 radio, and before you knew it everyone was talking about that "Get High" song.

Armed with plenty of weed in his pipe, and a Colt .45 in his brown paper bag, Afroman was rollin' in the green with a hit song and an album on the horizons. This guy seemed poised to be the next big thing in rap. But wait, there was one problem. His rhyming skills sound like something off of a P.N. News demo tape (if you know what I'm talking about, God help you). And his beats sound like something from the first day of Hip-Hop Producing 101 (offered at UCAL-Compton), and are perhaps the most simplistic of any mainstream rap album over the past few years. Quite simply, in comparison with his rap compadres, Afroman makes Lil' Romeo look like Dr. Dre.

Sure, "Because I Got High" is a funny song the first half dozen or so listens. And that's pretty much it for Afroman's contribution to the musical world. Tracing the trials and tribulations of Afroman's world where the time is always 4:20, the track is genuinely funny. "I was gonna go to class, but then I got high/ I could have cheated and I could have passed, but then I got high," Afroman spouts with pride. By the end of the track Afroman's life is "all screwed up," because "I Got High." But make no mistake, Afroman still ain't got nothing but love for the wacky tobaccy.

After the novelty hit comes the rest of the album. Afroman fornicates with the daughter of the "leader of the Klu Klux Klan" in the track "Crazy Rap." In the song he travels the globe doing his best Wilt Chamberlain impression with the women of the world. During a stop in Kentucky he meets "Colonel Sanders' daughter," where she tells him that she'll "fry some chicken if you fuck me." Afroman then gives her his "secret blend of herbs and spices."

An angst-ridden Afroman spills his guts in "She Won't Let Me...", a track about his girlfriend "not putting out," even though she always stays at his house and "drinks all his beer" and "smokes all his weed." As Afroman puts it, "He really needs to bust a nut."

"Let's All Get Drunk" sounds like an anthem for every weekend at UMass. 'Let's All Get Drunk tonight/ I hope I don't fight with a punk tonight/ Let's all get high tonight, maybe nobody will die tonight." Brilliant. Afroman even goes drinking and driving in a verse that is probably MADD's worst nightmare. Sure, it crosses the boundaries of what is tasteful. But remember, this guys name is AFROMAN.

The album takes a slight turn near its conclusion, as Afroman gets a little serious. "Palmdale" is his six minute life story, where he tells us how he made it out of the hood, needless to say, "Juicy" this is not. He then proclaims in preacher like fashion that he is in fact the personification of the American Dream, in the album closer "The American Dream."

The Good Times functions best as a comedy album. The 10 tracks do provide plenty of one liners, plays on words and shocking lyrics. Still, if this is indeed purely a comedy album, it simply isn't funny enough.

Afroman's talent is questionable, and his debut effort - while funny at times - will likely wear out its welcome after just a few spins.

Final Aaliyah CD is an R&B gem

AALIYAH
Aaliyah
Blackground

We first met R&B vocalist Aaliyah (Swahili for "exalted one") in 1994 when she released her solo debut Age Ain't Nothing But a Number before even finishing high school. Driven by the hugely successful "Back and Forth", the album went platinum. In 1996, she released her sophomore disc One in a Million which again put her on top of the charts with "If Your Girl Only Knew." Since that release Aaliyah remained in the pop spotlight with radio and dance gems such as "Are You That Somebody ?" off the Dr. Dolittle sound track. Continuing to put her spin on teen romance, Aaliyah released "Try Again" on last year's Romeo Must Die soundtrack.

Aaliyah features the imprint of regular Aaliyah contributors Timbaland and Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliott, who always keep things fresh. The trio created a largely up-tempo, thrillingly melodramatic set that takes a view into matters of the heart. Perhaps these songs are a product of her marriage to then producer R. Kelly, 10 years her senior, whom she wed when she was a mere 15-year-old. The marriage has since been annulled. "We Need a Revolution," the first single from the album, has a club beat that combines tight production with crafty songwriting. The cut doesn't contain a radio-friendly vibe and hasn't received the type of success her previous releases have experienced. Still, Aaliyah is replete with fine songs and excellent production.

On "More Than a Woman" the singer promises to be "more than a lover" as the braying guitars and aggressive synths metaphorically spread her wings into maturity. Another charmer is the compassionate "I Care 4 U," the tale of a comforting friend, which dips and dives in vocal and musical orchestration.

But most of the tracks on the album focus on what she's known for best: playing a hurt or betrayed lover. "Who do you think you are now?/ I can't believe you've got the nerve boy" she chastises to a player on "U Got Nerve." The zings hip-hop-textured composition echoes a feverish passion from the lyrics. Attention to detail can also be seen in the piano driven kiss-off "I Refuse" which opens with the ominous sounds of thunderstorms and horse hooves clattering in the distance. The gloom and doom soundtrack set the mood for the melodramatic song where Aaliyah decides to let a bitter relationship pass without regret. On yet another synth-heavy song, "I Can Be," the chanteuse preaches "I can be all the things you think she might."

Aaliyah teams up with Static from Playa on "Loose Rap," which crashes like waves and then peacefully settles into the ocean with its stop-and-go rhythms. "Extra Smooth," vaults somewhere beyond hip-hop and drum-and-bass, wonderfully tapping into reserves of funk and playfulness.

The album's best track is the erotic "Rock the Boat", where her sexual purrs are lacquered in a smooth and airy groove as instrumentation swells with and ebbs away from her voice. "Rock the Boat/ work the middle/ change positions/ stroke it lur me" the sex kitten salaciously orders. The track drips in sexual heat, passion and steam.

But Aaliyah also showcases some of the singer's weaknesses, which usually come when she takes a leap beyond her range or delves into cheesy Latin grooves or heavy metal. Her limited vocal range is exposed on the last song "What If" and the bonus track "You Messed Up" where a plethora of instruments virtually drown out the lyrics.

Aaliyah's meteoric rise to the top was sullenly brought to an end on August 25 when the plane she was riding crashed, killing her and the five other passengers aboard.

Aaliyah showed her soul-baring side on her latest album, proving she had become more confident and independent. She had come into her own as a woman, steering her own sexuality and using it to explore her own fantasies and strengths. The sultry songbird had a knack for experimenting on her songs, which is more than can be said about the current slate of teen-pop warblers. In stark contrast to similar albums that use cliche lyrics and bland craft, this record rises as one of the best hip-hop/R&B/rap records in recent memory. It's sad to think about what other things this rising and talented star could have achieved.

Musketeer – all for none

By Adam White

The Musketeer
Directed by Peter Hyams with Justin Chambers, Mena Suvari, Tim Roth and Stephen Rea
Playing at Hadley Cinemark

They must have gotten the tagline on the trailer wrong. Instead of The Musketeer: As You've Never Seen It Before, it should have read:

The Musketeer Never Seen It.

Judging purely by audience reaction, you'd think that this tenth remake of the Renaissance classic was a wonderful piece of cinema. The theater was certainly buzzing throughout its opening-night screening, with those in attendance murmuring and laughing throughout this rendition of the Alexander Dumas tale.

But make no mistake: this is one terrible movie. The murmurs were often expressions of disbelief, and the laughter came not at punch lines but at decidedly serious points in the film. And when the film finally ended and the audience filed out, the buzz was of the "worst movies ever" variety.

It is hard to believe that a new rendition of this tale could possibly be worse than the 1993 Disney version, which featured half the cast of Young Guns in ridiculously overdone costumes delivering annoyingly modernized dialogue. That version left many critics pining for the classic 1974 version of TSM, and wondering what Disney had hoped to bring to the story with its rendition.

Such a motive is plain with this newest take, as the trailer promises incredible fight scenes courtesy of veteran martial arts guru Xin-Xin Xiong (the stunt coordinator on such films as 1996's Black Mask and 1997's Double Team). After the recent success of Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon and the let Li vehicles Romeo Must Die and Kiss of the Dragon, it seemed a no-brainer that a mix of classic storyline and high-speed martial arts fight style would spell an ultimately entertaining movie.

But what it ends up spelling, thanks to an inexplicably dumbed-down screenplay from Gene Quintano, is a serious cinematic identity crisis. The Musketeer swings back and forth from Kung fu-style action to goofy slapstick humor so randomly that the audience gets caught somewhere in between, laughing at the quasi-serious parts and groaning at the attempts at humor.

There is also an almost uncanny feeling that director Peter Hyams and company ran out of money during production and had to slap large portions of the film together – the opening credits look like they were created on a PC using the Paint program, while several of the its segues are choppy to say the least. One such transition, just after Mena Suvari's Francesca is captured, is so jarring that the audience erupted in confused laughter.

Oh yeah, the story. As the title implies, The Musketeer centers wholly on the character of D'Artagnan, who witnesses the brutal murder of his parents in the movie's opening sequence and spends the rest of the film exacting his revenge. Justin Chambers (The Wedding Planner) brings nothing new to the role, and no amount of pseudo-hippy costume magic can disguise the fact that Chambers looks way too much like Chris O'Donnell (the Disney D'Artagnan) to be taken seriously as the infamous fourth musketeer.

Together with a cast of thoroughly one-dimensional supporting characters, Chambers wages an improbable war on the sinister duo of Cardinal Richelieu and his sidekick Febre, played by Stephen Rea and Tim Roth respectively. Roth has honed the diabolical madman thing down to perfection, and his puffy black leather outfit may be the most interesting part of this picture.

The three other musketeers are all but lost in the shuffle, though Nick Moran (Aramis) tries valiantly to save his first notable role since Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels. Suvari is written in as a sort of tag-along love interest to the hero, but there is so little chemistry between the two that by the time Quintana's "kidnapped heroine" sequence rolls around, there is little concern for her well being.

Mena Suvari
COURTESY UNIVERSAL

Admittedly, the film's first big fight sequence is exciting. As Chambers' stunt double mops up a tavern with no less than five ruffians, there is a feeling that the whole Renaissance / martial arts thing might actually work. That feeling quickly sinks, however, during an absolutely ludicrous carriage chase scene in which D'Artagnan no less than rewrites the laws of physics in besting a dozen more adversaries. Things get even sillier during a tower sequence, when our hero grabs a rope and casually scales a 70-foot tower, stopping midway to engage another handful of baddies in an absurd aerial duel.

By the time the climactic ladder fight takes place, the viewer yearns for some good old-fashioned, feet-on-the-ground sword fighting. But instead, Chambers and Roth leap effortlessly around a two-story room filled (for no apparent reason) with dozens of ladders. By the time the fight ends (abruptly, as if the stunt doubles suddenly ran out of gas) those in attendance are truly sick of all the flying around rubbish.

Tim Roth
COURTESY UNIVERSAL

Is there a single reason to watch The Musketeer? Well, the interaction between D'Artagnan and his (apparently very) beloved horse is unintentionally hilarious. Suvari's line just before the D'Artagnan – Febre duel is one of the silliest ever uttered onscreen.

But if you're really that hungry for a dose of Dumas, go out and rent Richard Lester's wonderful '74 version instead (the cast alone – Richard Chamberlain, Charlton Heston, Faye Dunaway, etc. – is well worth the cost of the rental).

And that way, your own personal list of "worst movies ever" won't get any longer.

Bubble Boy flops with a pop

Jake Gyllenhaal stars in Bubble Boy.

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

Bubble Boy
Directed by Blair Hayes
with Jake Gyllenhaal
Playing at Springfield Cinemas in Springfield

Bubble Boy is by far the most offensive and rude movie I have ever seen. The writer's first name is Cinco, for cryin' out loud! What should we have expected from a guy named after a number? First and foremost, his Hollywood writing debut is a big zero. The director, Blair Hayes, who also makes his feature film premiere, should go crawl underneath a rock in some country far, far away and never be heard from again.

My highest objection to this film feces is that it leaves no stone unturned when it comes to slurring and bashing people. Among many things, religion is a target of destruction, as one character says that Jews would ask for more than $10,000 in a ransom situation. Being of the Jewish faith myself, however unobservant I may be, there are certain things within my religion that I have no problem laughing at and joking about. No one laughs when it's said in Bubble Boy. Instead it's degrading and anti-Semitic.

There was a good deal of controversy in getting Bubble Boy to the screen because of its sensitive content. The story, about a boy who is born without an immune system and must live within a germ-free bubble, certainly hits close to home for those coping with the disease. A recent morning talk show hosted a mother whose son had died from the disease, and how she had made an attempt to keep Bubble Boy from being released. Her reasoning was that the script turned the title character's disease into a joke and offered no insight into the illness or, at the very least, a sympathetic point of view. Rather, Bubble Boy, aka Jimmy, is played off as though he has a form of mental retardation. I'm sure that living in a plastic cage can do something to your social life, and while I'm no doctor, I doubt that it makes you slur your speech like a third-grader.

What truly amazed me is the foul language and sexual innuendo found in a movie that's targeted for family audiences. The use of the words "retard," "whore," "slut" and "bitch" are common utterings, and there are plenty of references to women's features that can, I suppose, resemble bubbles. Yet Bubble Boy also attempts to poke fun at male genitalia, when he produces his first erection. "What is it?" he shrieks to his mother, to which she replies to do like his father does in such instances and repeat the "Star Spangled Banner" until it subsides. I don't know about you, but that's about the most unfunny thing I've ever heard. While Jimmy may not be retarded, this is further evidence that the writer most certainly is.

In all of this slamming I've done so far, I think it's noteworthy to mention that I am not a prude when it comes to movie topics. I've seen American Pie, Tomcats and Scary Movie but nothing has ever insulted me so much as a person and as a movie-lover as did Bubble Boy. No ejaculation, puking or crapping gimmicks have ever grossed me out as much as the downright distaste of the jokes found within. Sometimes the most vulgar things are what people say, not what their bodies manufacture. Never before have I felt so strongly that a movie's rating was way off-kilter. Bubble Boy was rated PG-13, but should have been rated R. To think that the movie was approved and released at this rating so children could see is perhaps the biggest disgust so far.

I thought Jake Gyllenhaal was a very promising actor after seeing him in October Sky and why he would follow that up with this retched piece of celluloid is beyond me. The original Bubble Boy, or rather, The Boy in the Plastic Bubble starring John Travolta, was, if not somewhat schmaltzy, at least inoffensive. If Gyllenhaal is trying to be the next Travolta, or Charlie Sheen, for that matter, he can't go around being in movies that so degrade and humiliate the people who pay to see it.

Shame on Disney for allowing such a movie to even be discussed, let alone released. And let's hope this concept never touches Hollywood ever again.

Central Division

The Titans could very well be the best team in football, especially with a top five defense bolstered by the arrival of DE Kevin Carter. But all is not well in Nashville. To win the division Tennessee must beat the Super Bowl Champion Ravens and to beat the champs Eddie George must have a good day on the ground. Sorry "Music City," that isn't likely to happen against a team that can't count past 99.

Baltimore Ravens

West Division

The Bronco's have a clutch QB, two quality wide outs and those three All-Pro running backs. If the defense can keep the opposition under 28, than the Broncos have a good chance of running away with Mr. Lombardi's trophy. Although there are some guys in Oakland that may argue against Denver even winning the division.

Denver Broncos
2000 Record: 11-5 (second in AFC West)
Week 1 Result: Played NYG Monday Night
Head Coach: Mike Shanahan

Offense
QB – Brian Griese (216-336, 2,688 yards, 19 TD, 4 INT)

Way Back Boston

A trip around the peaks and valleys of N.E. sports

Hello ladies and gentlemen, boys and girls, it's time to take a trip with me. So grab Mr. Peabody because we are going to the Way Back Machine.

This week's adventure takes us to a far off time when everything in the New England sports world seemed, in the words of 2001 MTV Best Hip Hop Video Music Award winners Outkast, "so fresh and so clean." Oh yes this was a time when the future looked bright and the notion of rabid Massachusetts sports fans uttering the words, "I can't wait for the NBA preseason to start," seemed laughable.

So when was this you ask, the 1980's, the 60's or even the 20's? No, it was August.

Ahh, August how I fondly remember you. The Red Sox were vying for both the American League East title and the wild card, the Patriots were defying their critics by cruising to a 3-1 preseason record and the United States Men's National Soccer team, despite a 1-0 loss in Mexico, looked an odds on bet to qualify for the 2002 World Cup.

But oh how things have changed in just a month's time. Thanks to men like Joe Kerrigan, Mr. Wobbles, Dan Duquette, Milton "Tyson" Nunez, Ronaldo Fonseca and Jon Kitna, the hope of August has turned into the despair of September.

In proper journalistic style we're going to discuss this in an inverted pyramid with the most pressing and pertinent issues first followed by the lesser points. In doing so we are going to examine, in the words of Jeremy Goodwin, Josh Malina's character from the television show SportsNight, "how this boat that was supposed to win, met with this kind of disaster."

Back on August 16 the Red Sox sat just two games behind the Yankees in the East and the A's in the wild card. On that day the club fired manager Jimy Williams and replaced him with pitching coach Joe Kerrigan. Since then the Sox have compiled a record of 7-16 (including 0-6 against the hated Yanks) and fallen 12 games behind Oakland and 13 behind New York. Clubhouse tensions are at an all-time high and the players no longer seem to care. Pedro Martinez and Nomar Garciaparra are done for the season, Manny Ramirez and Izzy Alcantara have decided that hustling down the first base line just isn't their bag anymore and the front office is feeling more heat than Gary Condit.

Red Sox Nation is in big trouble. It is impossible for fans to watch games anymore without utilizing the now famous Troy Aikman Concussion Face. As any of you who read Bill Simmons' column on ESPN Page 2 know, the Troy Aikman Concussion Face is an entirely expressionless look with your eyes being completely glazed over and your mouth hanging open, with your bottom lip quivering oh-so-slightly. You watch, hoping against all hope, that this will be the day that the boys turn it all around, knowing all along that it just isn't going to happen.

The season is as good as over and that's it. When Jimy was managing this club he would do anything he could to keep the team on edge and the players hated it. It was a team though, they were all united against the boss and they played hard to prove him wrong. But with Kerrigan now in the hot seat, the team seems as if it no longer has anything to play for.

One team that suddenly has a lot to play for is the U.S. Men's National Team. The Nats picked up 13 of a possible 15 points in their first five qualifying matches and seemed a lock for qualifying for the 2002 World Cup. But now three consecutive defeats later, including a 3-2 loss to Honduras in Washington D.C., the Americans first loss on home soil in a qualifier in 16 years, qualification is anything but assured.

Like the Red Sox, the Red, White and Blue have encountered an injury crisis as of late with key players like Clint Mathis, Josh Wolff, Claudio Reyna and Brian McBride all missing the home loss to Honduras and the 2-0 loss in Costa Rica. They have also, like the Red Sox, lost the simple desire to play. The entire team looks uninspired, especially the back four. After allowing just one goal in its first five qualifiers, the once airtight American defense has allowed six in the last three matches. The three goals conceded against Honduras at RFK Stadium marked the first time since 1980 that the U.S. had allowed three goals in a home qualifier.

Now the U.S. must win its two remaining matches, at home to Jamaica on October 7 at Foxboro Stadium and at Trinidad and Tobago, games once expected to be meaningless, as well as hope that either Mexico or Honduras loses in order to reach Japan/South Korea in 2002.

Lastly there is the beloved New England Patriots. On the heels of a 5-11 season and with star wide receiver Terry Glenn suspended for the entire season, prospects looked dim to say the least.

But a promising 3-1 preseason, a number of veteran free agent pickups and one of the easiest schedules in the NFL led to a slight glimmer of hope. A glimmer that was quickly dashed with Sunday's 23-17 loss to the Bengals in Cincinnati.

The Pats once again could not run the ball against the mighty Bengals defense (just 68 yards rushing), could not protect quarterback Drew Bledsoe (sacked four times and hit or pressured on numerous other occasions), and could not stop the Bengals running game (158 yards on the ground).

Everybody who once predicted at least a 2-0 start are now praying that what they saw from Chris Weinke and the rest of the Carolina Panthers in their 24-13 win in Minnesota was as much of an anomaly as was the Patriots sub par performance in Cincy.

The future looks bleak for New England sports and it's only gonna get worse. So, when does the NBA preseason start?

Back seat driver thoughts

Remember when UMass almost had Kansas State on its schedule? Wouldn't that have been twelve times worse than Marshall?

Roger Clemens going 20-1 is my own personal hell.

If the Red Sox had gone down any faster, they'd be starring in their own porno film.

McGuirk Observation Number One: every time the Marching Band sets off the mini-cannons in the McGuirk endzone, we're that much closer to a horrible, horrible accident.

UMass played a lot better against Marshall than I expected. And still lost by 29.

If Matt Guice gets the handcuffs taken off, if UMass can beat Delaware (Hofstra doesn't look so good after a loss to Rhode Island), if UMass can find a secondary, if UMass can gel offensively, if Mark Whipple can keep the team focused, maybe we'll have a chance to get beaten in the playoffs by Georgia Southern.

Fresno State is this year's Northwestern, Tulane, Hawaii...great season, a few big upsets, and then, the recipient of a pillar-to-post whipping in a bowl game.

Observation Number Two: when the announcer at McGuirk says that there are three dignities at the lost and found, do the band members dancing the endzone pick them up right then, or do they have to wait until after the game?

The WUSA playoffs are coming up. Oh, they're over. It went that well for the fledging league.

With Monty Mack off the Minutemen, who's going to provide entertainment for the team?

I sat down this weekend and watched the Sportscentury episode about Andre Agassi and all I can say is this: you'd have to be awfully unplugged from the world to catch somebody's serve, mid-match, and then wonder why the crowd booed you for disrespect.

You have to wonder just how creeped out Mary Carillo gets whenever Bud Collins is in the booth with her. He's always reaching over and putting his hand on her leg during a tremendous match point and she's slapping it away while trying to make sure the microphone doesn't catch the sound. He just gives you that "I love it when their dresses come up real high during the volley" feeling.

Observation Number Three: some schools have legitimate cannons that are fired after a touchdown. We have the Saturday Night Special cannon. Some schools have cannons previously used in warfare. We have cannons previously used in Oompa-Loompa warfare.

On Sunday, the football studio team for CBS Sports made tennis predictions. Iron Mike Ditka blew the call, totally. Sampras? It's like he's never played or coached tennis before...

Observation Number Four: if only there was tailgating at UMass football games, we continually increase the possibility of horrible embarrassing student behavior that inspires the Minutemen to victory.

Intramural season, what?

I'm not going to coach for Toot Cahoon, but if I was in charge of the UMass men's hockey team, my name wouldn't be Toot.

It's funny that he raps about beating ass so much because I have a feeling that in a straight-up fight, I could beat Eminem pretty badly.

Hands down, I think. Central could beat Southwest at getting high. I really do.

How about UMass football standout Kole Ayi falling on a fumble yesterday in the Rams-Eagles game? Definitely the biggest play by a UMass football player turned professional since Khari Samuel made a special teams tackle against the Cowboys...

Observation Number Five: There are more people in the Campus Center Basement's McGuirk painting than had ever been in the stadium before. Ever.

The Atlanta Falcons need to take the plunge and start Mike Vick. As good as Chris Chandler is at getting horrible concussions every other game, I don't know if it's helping the team anymore.

The New England Patriots' center Mike Compton might have been my student physical education teacher in the sixth grade, but I wouldn't admit that after seeing the way he played against the Bengals on Sunday.

Observation Number Six: The UMass cheerleaders do their pushups a lot better than the three guys in the endzone. I'm just saying...

Most intriguing match-up was the Cowboys versus the Buccaneers. It was like that first time you play Madden 2002, and you're the All-Madden team and the machine is the Browns. You win the game but God was it ugly.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) - Not everything has to be "fun" to be profitable. Your hard work today is likely to pay off in subtle ways that are not readily apparent.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) - Repetition is the surest way you can get it right today. Don't let yourself become frustrated or bored - for that way failure lies!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) - There are a few important facts that you must come to accept today, if you're not to sacrifice more than you can recover in the time available.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) - You needn't be the leader at all times - but today it will benefit everyone if you take the reins yourself and do what you must.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) - You will have to make sure that those working with you have what it takes to come through when the pressure's on. The answer may surprise you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) - Your home is your castle - and today you've got to take precautions to see that no one tries to storm it and pull you from your throne.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) - All you need to know today you probably already know - and if you don't, you surely know where to learn it. Ask a friend first!

ARIES (March 21-April 19) - Avoid spending too much money today; use a little more caution when it comes to your pocketbook. Someone close to you will make you an offer.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) - Demonstrate your artistic sensibilities freely today - but don't forget that you may well attract some criticism as a result.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) - You're more interested in dealing with others on the same level today, rather than "lording" it over those around you.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) - Your current attitude may not be taking into account all aspects of a tricky situation. Don't be quite so flip and dismissive today.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) - Begin by telling the truth as you know it today, and you can end by facing it with confidence, no matter how unpleasant, when the time comes.

Necessary toughness

Former Minutemen on the brink of pro stardom

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

This little town won't let the nation's gridiron forget who prized him first. Remember folks; it was Amherst, then St. Louis. Not the other way around.

One of the top linebackers in Massachusetts football history, Kole Ayi was seen yesterday in Philadelphia with a No. 54 St. Louis Rams jersey fixed to his back.

A year ago, No. 50 was his calling for the Maroon and White.

"He almost did not get signed," UMass coach Mark Whipple said Wednesday at the school's weekly Sports Luncheon. "I was shocked. He was going around and no team really wanted him. But finally, he hooked on with the Rams.

"And the GM told his agent that he beat out five guys for the job."

The Rams executives should be patting themselves on the back right about now. If it weren't for Ayi's heroics Sunday against the Eagles, St. Louis would most likely be 0-1.

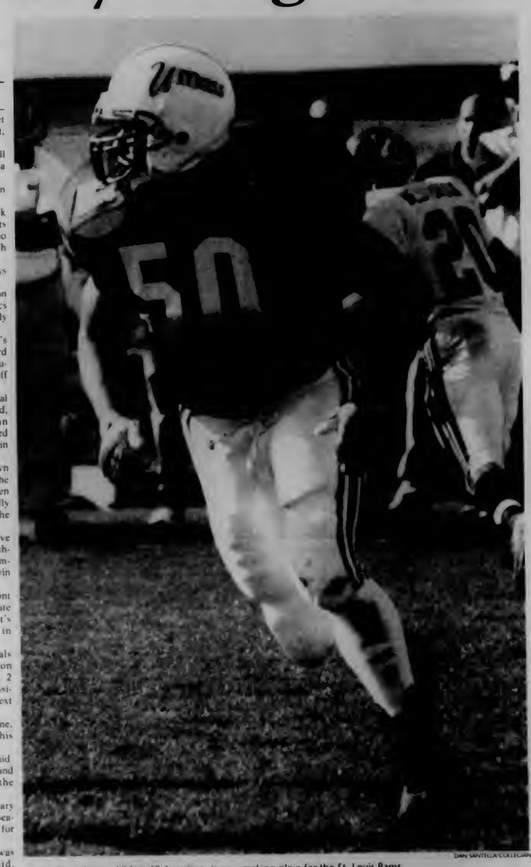
With 5:59 left in the fourth quarter, Philadelphia's Donavan McNabb targeted Cecil Martin for an 8-yard touchdown to lock the score at 17-17. And on the ensuing kick-off, it looked as if the Eagles might finish off the late comeback.

After accepting the kicker's boot on his team's goal line, the Rams' Aveion Cason took a few steps up field, broke left and attempted to spin away from an approaching defender. In doing so, Cason was drilled from behind and the ball was knocked loose into plain sight of four Eagles.

But they failed to recover. As one Eagle bent down to pick up the football, another came diving in from the left side and collided with his teammate. The ball then squirted backward and ricocheted off another Philly defender before scattering into a pack of players on the 5-yard-line.

It was then that Ayi, arguably the best defensive player in Division I-AA history, shot through the gathering and lunged on top of the pigskin for the first fumble recovery of his pro career. St. Louis went on to win 20-17 in overtime.

While Ayi was busy working the special teams front for the Rams Sunday, his friend and former teammate Marcel Shipp was at home watching him. But that's only because the Arizona Cardinals had the Bye in Week 1.



Shipp will be wearing No. 31 for the Cardinals Sunday when his new squad takes on the Washington Redskins at FedEx Field. Though listed as the No. 2 running back on the depth chart, there's a good possibility that Shipp could take on a major role come next week.

Michael Pittman has been suspended for one game, and Shipp will surely look to take advantage of his opportunity.

"Certainly they'll have great careers," Whipple said. "You've got to be in the right place at the right time and when you're only talking about 1500 players in the world – you're talking about a couple special guys."

Brian Smith, an integral part of UMass' secondary last year, pulled his hamstring in the middle of pre-season camp and failed to fight his way onto the roster for the San Francisco 49ers.

"Early on he played pretty well and he really was excited about his opportunity," Whipple said. "Unfortunately, he pulled his hamstring again and he just never was able to get up to speed."

Changing of guard for NFL linebackers

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

To all armchair quarterbacks out there, don't rub your eyes; they are in perfect working order. The flashes of blurred vision and the instant unification of colors have nothing to do with deteriorating pupils or the sight-diluting effects of the booth tube. It is not your eyesight decreasing, it is simply the ever-amplifying speed of the game.

Once meant for giants who could simply dominate the gridiron with mere brute strength, football now caters to the burners who combine their feverish pace with potency to form a freakish athlete the likes of which the game has never seen.

This deadly combination of speed and strength has slowly become evident in most positions, but nowhere has the change been more drastic than at middle linebacker.

A position once inhabited by monstrous purveyors of pain, the strong but dawdling titans could no longer survive in a league ruled by downfield wheelers. The "Mike" (middle linebacker) beckons the supreme athlete who can hinder the run and battle between the tackles as well covering swift running backs that venture into their lair.

The middle linebacker is the do-it-all captain of the defense. He must be an ubiquitous force from sideline to sideline. No one is safe from the from the 21st century's version of the "Mike"... nobody.

Following is a list of the league's five best middle linebackers. A panel of football experts compiled the record. The players are listed in no particular order.

AFC season preview

Ray Lewis, Baltimore

This Raven seemingly explodes out of the shadows of his own defense, swooping down and engulfing opposing players. No one misses less tackles than No. 52 and no one is better sideline to sideline. He is everywhere, really. He is the best in the game, period.

Zach Thomas, Miami

He is a tackling machine. Much like Lewis he is the key to his defense. But unlike his Baltimore counterpart, the "D" is not designed for him to make tackles. He simply goes out and gets them. He pursues better than anyone in the league, and he doesn't miss many when he gets there.

London Fletcher, St. Louis

He is undersized and underskilled and nobody thought that he would make the NFL, let alone start, let alone be an All Pro, let alone win the Super Bowl. Fletcher has defied all the odds and he defies them still, as he captains a swift and resurgent Rams defense. His minus six-foot frame is tough to stop but you better believe he'll be there when you think you see a hole in the line.

Jeremiah Trotter, Philadelphia

He says he wants to be the best linebacker in the game and you know if the guy named Lewis wasn't around he just might be. Scouts describe him as an absolute beast in the middle. He has the look of a hawk, as he scouts out his prey before pouncing. Trotter doesn't play around; when he sees an opening he tries to knock your head off. Don't throw at him and don't run near him unless you don't mind parting with the ball, or your head for that matter.

Brian Urlacher, Chicago

He had 124 tackles and eight sacks last year. Pretty good, right? Oh yeah, those 124 tackles and eight sacks were compiled as a rookie. Urlacher is a 6-foot-3, 244 pound guided missile. In just his first season he exhibited all the qualities of a great linebacker. He has the speed to run down running backs in the flat and he has the strength to bust through the line and annihilate the quarterback on blitzes.

Obviously, this ranking omits many big names including the Raiders' Greg Biekert and the Lions' Stephen Boyd, but no other "Mike's" in the league merge power with speed like the five listed above. With the freakish skills that these monsters employ, they have the tools and the determination to dominate opposing offense's for years to come.

TRAGEDY

By Adam White and Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

America suffered the worst terrorist attack in its history yesterday morning when a trio of hijacked commercial aircraft was crashed into three nationally recognized buildings in New York City and Washington D.C.

The World Trade Center's Twin Towers were both leveled and a portion of the Pentagon was destroyed by the attacks, which began shortly before 9 a.m. and concluded roughly an hour later. A count of casualties from the incidents has yet to be determined, though officials have speculated that tens of thousands of people may have perished in the attacks.

"I have a sense it's a horrendous number of lives lost," said New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani. Reports have trusted that upwards of 50,000 people visited the towers on a daily basis, while New York City officials have reported at least 78 police officers missing and 200 firefighters presumed dead in the aftermath of the attacks.

The incident began at approximately 8:45 a.m. when American Airlines Flight 11, originally routed from Boston to Los Angeles, struck the northern tower of the Trade Center. The Boeing 767 was reportedly carrying 88 passengers and an 11-person crew when it took off from Logan Airport.

A second plane, identified as United Airlines Flight 175, collided with the Trade Center's southern tower roughly 19 minutes later. That plane, also a 767 and also routed from Boston to L.A., has been reported by the airline as carrying 56 passengers and a nine-person crew.

Both 110-story towers collapsed within roughly 90 minutes of the initial crashes. There were reportedly explosions from within the buildings before the final collapse, though there has been no confirmation yet of their cause.

A third hijacked aircraft, identified as American Flight 77 from Washington Dulles to L.A., crashed into the Pentagon at around 9:38 a.m. That 757 was listed as carrying 58 passengers and a six-person crew, and is reported to have crashed into the Army Command Center portion of the Pentagon. As of 6:00 p.m., over 30 casualties from that attack had been admitted to hospitals in Washington D.C. and northern Virginia.

A fourth hijacked plane, United Flight 93 from Newark to San Francisco, crashed in a rural area of Pennsylvania about 80 miles southeast of Pittsburgh. Thirty-eight passengers and a seven-person crew were reportedly aboard that 757. It is suspected that Flight 93 was headed toward the Presidential retreat at Camp David.

Officials have listed no survivors from that crash.

President George W. Bush curtailed an education trip in Florida upon hearing news of the attacks, flying under military fighter escort to Barksdale Air Force Base in Louisiana. There, the President announced that the U.S. military had been placed on "high-alert status" in the wake of the incident.

"Freedom itself was attacked this morning and I assure you freedom will be defended," Bush said. "Make no mistake. The United States will hunt down and pursue those responsible for these cowardly actions."

The President then reportedly flew on to Offutt Air Force Base in Nebraska, where the nation's Strategic Air Command Headquarters is located, to convene an emergency session of the National Security Council. In an address to the nation some five hours later, Bush assured the American public that an act meant to "frighten our nation into chaos and retreat" will only serve to further unite it.

Eyewitnesses detail NYC catastrophe

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Several eyewitnesses who were within a few blocks of the World Trade Center yesterday morning gave harrowing accounts of the multiple plane crashes and explosions that leveled the twin 110-story buildings.

Western Massachusetts native Mike Graubard, who was standing in a parking lot less than four blocks away from the scene, described it as "utter chaos" from the time that the first commercial jet struck the North Tower shortly before 9 a.m. Eastern Standard Time. He witnessed numerous people "jumping out of windows and plummeting down" after the first blast, and after retreating to his Murray St. apartment a block away, watched from his fire escape as a second plane struck the South Tower and both structures subsequently collapsed.

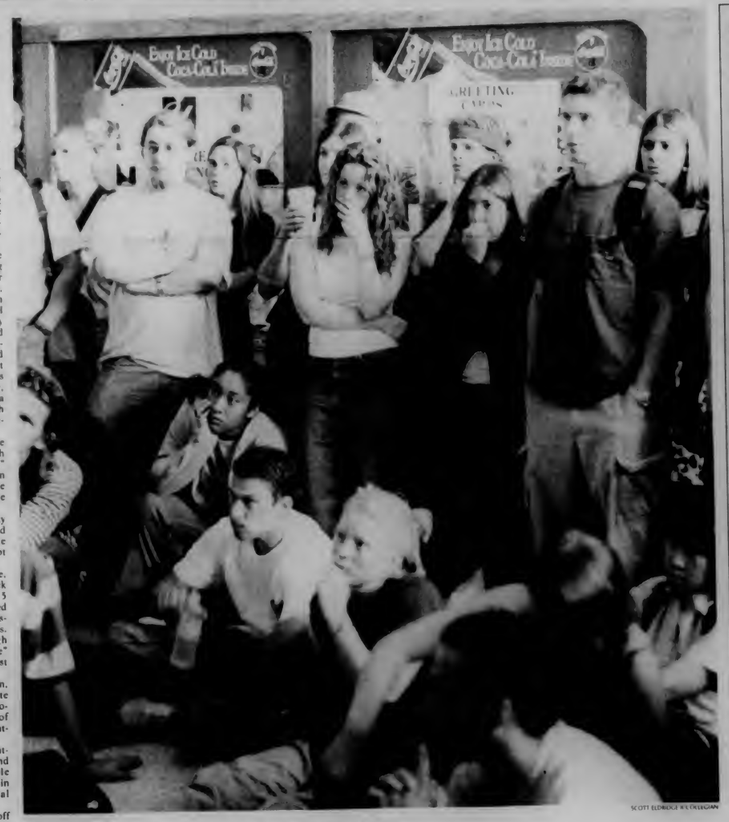
"I could see people waving white sheets out of windows [in the South Tower] just before it collapsed," Graubard said. "Then it was like an earthquake, like the blast wave from an atomic bomb, and I dove back into my apartment."

In a matter of minutes visibility was all but lost, as what Graubard described as a "blizzard of white powder from the concrete" swept through lower Manhattan.

Financial analyst Gary Valente, 31, had a clear view of the attack from the window of his 115 Broadway office, which overlooked the World Trade Center from a distance of approximately 200 yards. He was first alerted by a "high pitched whistling, like a missile" and looked out at the Towers just as the first plane struck.

"When I first saw the explosion, I thought it was a bomb," Valente said. "But then the second explosion went off, with a big ball of fire, and I knew it wasn't an isolated incident."

Valente's building was evacuated immediately after the second explosion, and the New Rochelle (NY) native made his way north in the direction of Grand Central Station.



Meanwhile, Graubard sealed off his apartment by closing the windows and placing towels under the doors, then began packing up clothes for himself and his two roommates in preparation for their eventual evacuation.

"I won't be able to get out of here for hours," Graubard said. "And once we do, we probably won't be able to get back in here for at least a week."

Staten Island resident Richard Barbiera confirmed that virtually all routes off of Manhattan Island have become impassable in the wake of the tragedy.

"People can't go home; they're just wandering the streets," said Barbiera, who caught the last Staten Island-bound ferry at 11

UMass system unites to deal with campus community anguish

In the wake of the national disaster, UMass campuses around the state cancelled classes and planned vigils.

UMass-Boston issued an announcement on its website that, "All classes are cancelled as of 11:15 a.m., Tuesday, September 11. All non-essential employees are encouraged to go home."

Nobody at UMass-Boston could be reached for comment.

The UMass Lowell website simply announced that all day and evening classes were cancelled.

UMass-Dartmouth Chancellor Jean MacCormack issued an announcement through the school's website. In the announcement, she told the UMass Dartmouth community, "I believe we are not in danger here at the campus, but we are taking reasonable safety precautions in any case. At a time like this, I want to stress that, as a University, we need to call on our best capabilities as rational, compassionate people."

She continued with, "I urge you to stress civility and tolerance as responsibility for the tragic events of the day become known. We are a diverse community, and we must all strive for global perspectives and way to create world j ace in non-violent ways."

A prayer service was conducted at 12:30 p.m. and other vigils are being planned.

Here at UMass-Amherst, the Chancellor cancelled classes at 1 p.m., and the Housing Cluster and Area Residence Directors have been designated communication and help centers for students who live on campus, while the Dean of Students Office has been designated an assistance center for students who live off campus.

OIT worker believed lost in disaster

COURTESY OF

Christoffer Carstanjen

Devastation and grief hit close to home yesterday when it was reported that Office of Information Technology Computer Research Specialist Christoffer Carstanjen was believed to be on one of the planes that crashed into the World Trade Center.

An inter-faculty email sent from Harlan Sturm, Accociate Dean of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, suggested that Carstanjen was a passenger United Airlines flight 175 from Boston.

Later, United Airlines was contacted as to confirm the claim, but had not yet responded at press time. The Airline has yet to release a passenger list for the downed plane.

During the candlelight vigil held last night on the Campus Pond, Interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams all but conceded the loss of Carstanjen.

University stunned by terrorism

By Suzanne Furst and Elizabeth Pariseau

As Tuesday morning's terrible news set in, most students gathered in solemn groups around televisions playing CNN at the Bluewall, Student Union and Hatch food court refused to speak.

Many were in tears, visibly upset, hugging one another. As the crowds grew, campus businesses set up coffee, bagels, brownies and other comforts for the students glued to scenes of panic in New York City – billowing clouds of white smoke, people trading one death for another as they jumped from the collapsing World Trade

"Terrorist attacks can shake the foundations of our biggest buildings, but they cannot touch the foundation of America," Bush said. "These acts shatter steel, but they cannot damage the steel of American resolve."

He added that the United States would treat the terrorists and those that harbor them on equal terms. Pundits have suggested that Bush was making a veiled threat at Afghanistan. The Islamic nation has previously hidden Osama bin Laden, a noted anti-American and a possible suspect in yesterday's terrorist attacks.

Retaliatory action was thought to have occurred less than nine hours later, when explosions were reported in the Afghan capital of Kabul. Subsequent wire reports reported that the U.S. military has denied any domestic link to the explosions.

"In no way is the United States government connected to those explosions," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said in a statement. Revolutionary groups within Afghanistan later claimed responsibility for the helicopter attacks.

World leaders joined Bush in his denunciation of terrorism. Britain's Tony Blair said, "as for those that carried out these attacks, there are no adequate words of condemnation. Their barbarism will stand as their shame for all eternity."

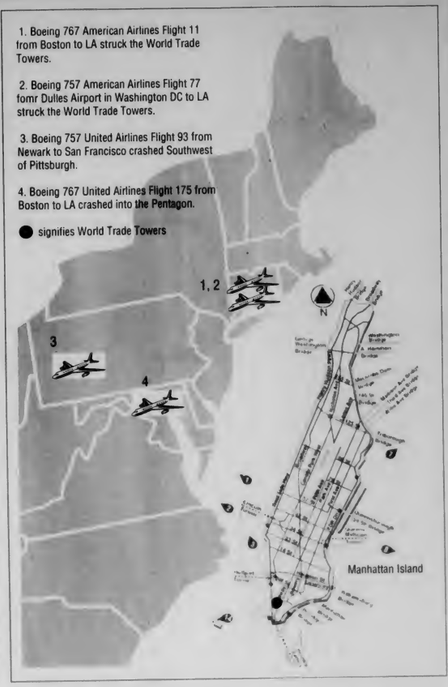
"France has just learned of these monstrous attacks ... there is no other word for it," French President Jacque Chirac said. German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder convened his own national security council, an unprecedented act.

The crashes in both Pittsburgh and Washington D.C. were preempted by cellular phone distress calls from passengers on board the two hijacked planes. A man allegedly called an emergency operator from a bathroom aboard Flight 93 and repeatedly said "we are being hijacked" shortly before the plane crashed in Pennsylvania.

Former federal prosecutor and conservative political commentator Barbara Olson reportedly called her husband, U.S. Solicitor General Ted Olson, on a cell phone from Flight 77 and said: "Can you believe this...we are being hijacked" prior to the plane's crash into the Pentagon.

Collateral damage in New York City has been extensive. Ten thousand rescue personnel rushed to the scene as buildings within and surrounding the Trade Center network caught fire. One of those, a 47-story structure designated "Trade Center Building Seven," collapsed shortly after 5:30 p.m.

The nation's oldest public health care facility, Manhattan's Bellevue Hospital, has been designated 'command central' for the N.Y.C. relief efforts. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) have enacted massive efforts to import emergency service personnel and medical supplies into the disaster area.



All manner of transit away from Manhattan Island was temporarily stalled in the wake of the incident. The New York Port Authority initially closed all bridges and tunnels leading into and out of the city, though the outbound lanes of most major bridges have since been reopened. Mass transit has also resumed after a several-hour lapse in service.

Nationally, the Federal Aviation Administration shut down all airports in the U.S. just before 10 a.m. and routed international flights bound for New York to Canada.

Yesterday's attacks are not the first waged against the World Trade Center, which was targeted by terrorists in a much less intricate plot in February of 1993. That incident resulted in a single blast that killed six people, injured over 1,000 more and caused millions of dollars in structural damage to the center.

Justice was meted out swiftly in that instance, as the trio of Ramzi Yousef, Mahmud Abouhalima and Mohammad Salameh was arrested and convicted. Salameh was nabbed while trying to return the group's getaway van to a Ryder office in Jersey City, NJ.

a.m. "All the bridges are closed and the ferries have been shut down."

Valente also confirmed that no trains were running out of Grand Central when he reached the station early yesterday evening.

"I'm still on-edge about the whole thing, and I'd really like to get the hell out of the city," Valente said. "But I don't think it's gonna happen tonight."

So, with no immediate means of evacuating the crippled city, residents were left to remain and amidst widespread fear and panic. Eighty-five year-old Matilde Freund, a native of Vienna, likened the situation to World War II.

"It reminds me of the times in France during the war, when I saw that the bridges had been bombed," said Freund, who now resides on Columbus Ave. near Central Park West. "I'm horrified. I'm shocked."

Others, like Graubard, could only wait and ponder the motivation behind the multi-targeted terrorist attack.

"The crazy thing is that it's all in the name of God," Graubard said. "These terrorists invoke God when they do these things and kill all these people."

"We grieve deeply for him, for the sorrow and sadness of his family," Williams said. "We feel deeply for his colleagues and friends."

Carstanjen was an integral part of OIT. Friend and co-worker Ben Gagnon described Carstanjen as, "easily one of OIT's nicest and most supportive individuals ever."

According to the OIT website, Carstanjen worked as an OIT liaison to the College of Humanities and Fine Arts. He also had a culinary arts degree, owned a Macintosh computer business, and worked as an information technology specialist at the Northfield Mount Hermon School. He enjoyed folk dancing, golfing, skiing and driving motorcycles.

Carstanjen had also just finished building a house in Turners Falls.

Last spring he was a member of the Multimedia Systems class in the Electronic and Computer Engineering department. The class was the first of its kind, a step toward the creation of an Information Technology minor.

"He was really passionate about his field," former classmate Eric Soderstrom, a junior Journalism major, said. "I didn't know him well, but it was a small class and you could just tell that he enjoyed being there."

"Tonight as we gather in this crisis, remember that the grief of one of us is the collective grief of all of us in this UMass family and in this UMass community as we grieve together."

"Last week, Christoff sat in front of the long OIT hallway and welcomed each new student [to the office]," Gagnon said. Christoffer Carstanjen will be missed on campus and in life.

Thousands gather on green to mourn

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

The bells of Old Chapel began to ring shortly before 6:30 p.m. last night, a sound few University of Massachusetts students have ever heard.

As the Student Union lawn quickly filled with an estimated 4,000 students, the ringing heralded support of the candlelight vigil organized by various campus religious leaders and administrators in response to the terrorist bombings of the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and the suspected death of a UMass staff member aboard one of the hijacked flights from Boston.

When the bells stopped, The UMass Saxophone Quartet began to play Bach's Sarabande and the entire crowd of students, faculty and children fell silent. On a normally bustling and noisy campus, the vigil was described by Reverend Kent Higgins of the United Christian Foundation as "something I don't know when I'll see again."

Interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams opened the vigil shortly after 7 p.m. Student Government Association President John Sheehan, Speaker of the Senate Aaron Saunders, Student Trustee Jon Laubinger and Assistant Dean of Students Merle Ryan also spoke at the candlelight vigil, but each expressed a loss of words for the day's tragic events.

"There are no words to explain, no words to soothe, no words to comfort, no words at all, especially for the individuals whose families are directly touched by this tragedy," Williams began. Williams also expressed grief for the death of Office of Information Technologies Computer Research Specialist Christoffer Carstanjen, who was reportedly aboard United Airlines Flight 175 that crashed into a World Trade Center tower at 9:04 a.m. yesterday.

Sheahan, following Williams, sent his prayers to those students and faculty who have lost people. As two of the four flights hijacked in the crisis departed from Boston, many people on campus knew – either well or in passing – passengers aboard the flight, or employees in the World Trade Center. Sheehan was no exception, "I know of personal friends of mine that have already lost someone in today's events. This isn't a time for grandstanding and this isn't a time for fist pumping. This is a time to come together as a family."

The vigil was designed for exactly that. According to Donald Lenze of the Navigators Christian Fellowship, the vigil was organized "to give the students opportunities to express their concern and thoughts."

Saunders said, "I'd like to express my feelings about today's horrific events but I think the words do not exist."

Laubinger expressed his sympathy for "everyone on campus who's world has been turned inside out," to everyone that watched on television the crashing of the two World Trade Center towers earlier that day.

Laubinger said, "But no matter how many people hate, no matter how many terrorists there are with guns or bombs, there is one institution they can't destroy and all of you here are symbolic of that, all of you are that: that's the human spirit, that's hope." Laubinger choked in sadness at his own words and quickly finished his speech.

One of the organizers explained that the leaders of campus religious groups, Christians, Muslims, Jews and "others of faith and good will" came to honor the souls of the victims, to support those who lost loved ones, and invited everyone to stand together for silence, prayer, or meditation.

Approximately 20 SGA members and student volunteers passed out nearly 1,800 candles donated by the Yankee Candle Company as the UMass Saxophone Quartet began playing again.

As the amount of candles could not accommodate the vigil crowd, many students shared candles and stood together in silence, some in tears. Between the podium and the crowd was a floor tom drum, placed upside down by Junior Political Science major Steve Hoeschele with the words "Please Donate to Trade Center Families." The crowd stirred and many people stood in line to drop money in the drum, some bills as big as $100. One student said of her donation, "It's for a good cause, it's not for Dominoes pizza or something." The total sum of donations collected that evening was $3,333.

At the end of the vigil, Ryan directed students to other events supporting the UMass community such as mass at the Newman Center, a Muslim Student Association (MSA) gathering in the Cape Cod Lounge, an SGA-sponsored vigil on the Metawampe Lawn as well as the Ark and the Hillel House. Closing the vigil, Ryan said, "As I look out on this sea of candles, that those candles with you lit [and] bring light to this dark moment of our history."

Some students flocked to the adjoining Metawampe Lawn with their candles. Secretary of Diversity Chris Rue spoke at the gathering. He said, "Take time to think about someone else other than yourself today because today was a tough day. What matters is people died today [but] today I saw something beautiful, I saw the UMass campus come together and it brought tears to my eyes."

Lenze also remarked, "It's a bad day, but it's a good day to be together."

However, many Muslims had to leave the candlelight vigil early for evening prayers at sunset. Although many members of the MSA and the Muslim community usually pray in their rooms, they decided to gather in prayer because of the day's tragic events. Member Mohammad Dastigir stated, "One can only assume because of today's events, there's going to be a backlash of negativity towards Muslims in general."

GERALD LING/COLLEGIAN

The vigil held on the Campus Lawn gathered hundreds of students together.

The Five-College Palestine Action Coalition has already experienced this as a reality. With the television broadcast of a group of Palestinians cheering over the demolition of some of America's key buildings coupled with media speculation, on-campus sentiment towards Muslims has already turned negative. Coalition member Iaved Memon said, "A lot of people have been coming up to us and saying, 'Why are you people doing this?'" Memon upholds that the Coalition and estimates that the majority of Palestinians condemn all attacks on civilians. The MSA upholds that it is the media's responsibility not to spread these stereotypes about Muslims and that "a little misunderstanding or missed facts goes a long way."

MSA President Navid Kahn expressed the official stand of the MSA. "The MSA, on behalf of all Muslims on campus, do condemn acts of violence and terrorism. [The] loss of human lives is not justified by any means. There's a lot going on in the world... [there are] Muslim-Americans in this society that are just as hurt, there are Muslim-Americans in New York, their families in those buildings."

Kahn also said that in every culture and religion there are "fanatics" or "madmen" who perform terrorist acts.

The 7 p.m. candlelight vigil followed a smaller vigil of about 40 students at 5:30 p.m. organized by the Board of Student Businesses on the lawn between the Student Union and the Library.

In reflection of the turnout of students, the condolences and sadness expressed, and the donations offered, Laubinger posed the question, "How can they say that college kids are apathetic?"

For people interested in donating to the families of the victims, the upside-down floor tom drum will be placed on the south side of the Student Union for the majority of today.

United States President Bush tries to reassure the American people

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The country waited with baited breath for the official statement by George W. Bush regarding the United State's course of action after the violent acts of terrorism yesterday, and they were not disappointed.

At 8:30 p.m. the President gave his statements regarding the tragedy from the White House, offering condolences to mourning families around the world and promising that "our country is strong" and that those responsible would be punished.

"The search is under way for those who are responsible for these evil attacks. We will make no distinction between the terrorists who committed those attacks and those who harbor them," Bush said.

An aide relayed the first word of the two planes crashing into the World Trade Center to the President yesterday morning while he was at an elementary school in Sarasota, Florida waiting to make a speech regarding education. He made a statement at 9:30 a.m. Tuesday morning calling the incident a "difficult moment for America."

"Today we've had a national tragedy. Two airplanes have crashed into the World Trade Center in an apparent terrorist act on our country," the President said. "Terrorism against our nation will not stand."

The President on his way back to Washington D.C. when he heard the news of the terrorist act that caused the collapse of a portion of the Pentagon and was taken to a Barksdale Air Force Base in Louisiana because of the dangers of returning to the White House at that time. After delivering a statement to the American people he was taken to an underground bunker in Omaha, Nebraska where he spoke to Vice President Dick Cheney in a teleconference format. Laura Bush, the First Lady was also taken to a safe place for a time in order to attempt to protect her from danger. The President made a second address from Louisiana promising punishment to those responsible for the acts.

"I want to reassure the American people that the full resources of the federal government are working to assist local authorities to save lives and to help the victims of these attacks," President Bush said. "Make no mistake: The United States will hunt down and punish those responsible for these cowardly acts."

He expressed his certainty that the country would persevere.

"The resolve of our great nation is being tested," the President said. "But make no mistake: We will show the world we will pass this test."

The national government also responded to the incident offering condolences, support and words of hope and coping themselves with the tragedy.

"Now is the time for us to come together as a nation to offer our support, our prayers for the victims and for their families," Attorney General John Ashcroft said. "For the rescue workers, for the law enforcement officials, for every one of us that has been changed forever by this horrible tragedy."

UMass students share experiences, thoughts, viewpoints and reactions center towers, and paper from the Twin Tower offices falling like snow over Brooklyn neighborhoods three miles away.

"Not right now...it's too difficult to process right now," said Alicia Belair, a senior, summarizing the general atmosphere of shock on campus.

The atmosphere also contained elements of disbelief.

"Scary. I never saw anything like this," said Katie Jarvis, a junior Sociology major.

Others had already had more time to mull over the disaster.

"It's a horrible situation. We're all going to lose a lot of our freedoms with this," predicted a University employee who asked not to be named. "I just can't believe the Towers collapsed, that they'd collapse that badly. They fell like a house of cards."

He said he found out about the disaster when a co-worker called him Tuesday morning. "I thought, well, what's the rest of the joke?" he said.

As the news set in, talk turned to the consequences of the attack.

"I'm starting to hear a lot about a war on the US," said Rori Hanson, a junior Theater major.

"We need to speak out against retaliation in all its forms and commit our lives to creating peace [from now on]," said People's Market employee Tameron Jospek. The sophomore Environmental Engineering major was handing out free bagels and coffee to students, "to bring people together so that some good can come of this evil."

"I hope there won't be war, but I think the government will have to exert pressure on other governments to press whoever did this — depending on whether it's an entire country or individuals – to act. I don't believe in an eye for an eye, but we have to take some action," said library employee Liz Reilly.

"Obviously, it's a tragedy," said Lt. Kyle St. Laurent, an employee of ROTC on campus, describing himself as "frustrated at all the different reactions," including those he said he has seen making light of what has happened, but mostly because of "not being able to do anything about it. We can't defend against this kind of thing."

As an active duty infantry officer, St. Laurent said he has "mixed emotions" about what happened.

"Initially it's shock, but then there's a growing anger. [an incident like this] fills [me] with deep passion for [my] job and a desire to serve the way [I feel I'm] supposed to serve," he said.

Despite hopes for peace, CNN began talking of "rage in the upper tiers of government," and a death toll in the thousands. This rage was reflected in the sentiments of many students, including senior Music major Heather Trammell.

"I think that whoever it is, we should find them and show them that we are the wrong people to do something like that to," she said. "We are going to retaliate. We have to. We're the most powerful country in the world, and with all the resources we have, whoever [did it] is basically going down. That's it."

But before many students worried about the future, they reacted strongly to the present.

"I was in my room getting ready to take a shower [when the planes hit]," said Toni Hankins, a senior at UMass. "My television was turned on to channel three. I saw New York, all of downtown Manhattan, engulfed in smoke. I saw that the screen said live. I saw the tower collapse, and I got emotional. Imagine the people that saw that the plane hit the tower. I am afraid to travel. My heart goes out to everyone."

"It's craziness. I don't even know what to say, I'm still taking it all in, said junior Courtney Streeter. "'America Under Attack' is a pretty harsh headline."

"It's probably the most terrible thing that will happen in our lifetime," said junior Scott Landes.

As CNN reported that the U.S. government was "literally trying to piece itself back together," members of the campus community engaged in a similar effort as news about relatives and loved ones affected by the disaster came in. "My girlfriend is in the air across the ocean right now," said senior Ilya Rzhevskiy. She left New York and is on her way to Germany. I'm so worried. I don't want to call her mom and worry her."

"My heart goes out to all the people who know anyone involved in the tragedies in either New York or Washington, because I have a brother and a cousin in both those places," said Trammell. "I didn't know about [my family] for a while and I was very scared about that. I can't even imagine the terror of people who have found out that they have actually lost family members."

Others emotionally reacted to the person or persons responsible. "I just don't think that whoever did this will gain from it," said Doug Murphy, a senior.

"I can't imagine any human being planning to do this," said senior English major Chris Collins. "With all the passengers on the planes...it's just disgusting."

Others held different opinions. Junior Marc Cesario commented, "The loss of life is a tragic thing. I sympathize. But, it happens everyday in countries such as Israel and Palestine. It happens in America and everyone in America is in an uproar. But, I'm not saying they shouldn't be... I think a lot of groups will claim it. It will bring an awareness."

This awareness has come as a rude shock to the campus community and the world at large. "I was driving on my way to work, and I had to pull over," said senior Kathryn Law.

"I just found out in class," said Chris Feener, senior. We don't have cable yet in the apartment. It's just a shock. It's the last thing I expected to hear about when I got to class."

The normally relaxed atmosphere of the Bluewall cafe was interrupted as students and professors alike flooded in, most still in a state of shock. The entrances and exits became nearly impassable as crowds of students gathered to watch CNN footage. Other students sat together at tables, wept and embraced one another, and made frantic calls on cell and pay phones.

"Who did this? Who did this?" cried one student to a friend.

For the most part, however, there was solidarity and quiet in what could have been mass hysteria. Bluewall employee Matt Mello, a senior Graphic Design major, clocked in for work at the Bluewall Deli at 11 a.m. He said he saw "100 people—silent—just looking at the TV."

Crowds at campus center dispersed around 1 p.m., as news came that the University was closing. Talk then turned to the consequences of the attack on UMass daily life.

"Are classes cancelled?" one student was overheard saying.

"That's what the President said," another replied.

Students gather in front of the Muslim Student Association to discuss the recent developments and campus reactions.

Muslim students concerned about backlash; A community fears religious intolerance

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Times of tragedy fuel blind emotions. The need to channel one's anger and confusion under distress often leads to irrational decisions in placing blame. People need an answer even when there isn't one.

Unconfirmed wire reports circulated yesterday morning that had the terrorist group Jihad claiming responsibility for the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. President Bush, in a press conference, vowed to "hunt down those responsible" for the attacks and bring them to justice.

The need for some sort of direction was evident on campus as students huddled around televisions hoping to make sense of the chaos. Unconfirmed reports of a poster being ripped down from the Muslim Student Organization (MSA) and various verbal altercations in front of the Student Union Center during the afternoon revealed an obvious tension among members of the UMass community.

Navid Khan, president of the MSA, woke up yesterday morning "expecting to have a regular day" and was shocked when he learned of the attacks. He is discouraged, though, at the immediate reaction of some students.

"It is kind of sad that people automatically think of Muslims," said Khan. "Our organization officially condemns the recent act of terrorism and all acts of terrorism, and grieves the loss of all human life."

Khan said there is concern about the backlash against Muslim students on campus. He is confident, however, that UMass students are intelligent and will act rationally.

"I hope people take a minute and think before they go out and act," he says.

UMass student Jay Fitch spoke outside the MSA office yesterday afternoon to Muslim students, members of the MSA and passing students about similar concerns for safety.

"Nerves are on edge, and people are going to act instinctually," Fitch said. Himself a Muslim, Fitch stressed that "we must act with love."

Fitch does "fear for the future" however, adding that future conflicts directed at Muslim students are inevitable, and he expects them.

Khan notes that there are members of the MSA who have friends and family in the New York area, and they are praying for them and anyone touched by the tragedy.

In the meantime, a support center has been set up at the MSA office in the Student Union, and is open to those who need someone to talk with or listen.

Khan plans to speak at one of the night vigils that are to be held around campus during the night of the attacks, and says that the MSA will soon be posting flyers on their bulletin board condemning the attacks.

The Big City response

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

The city that never sleeps was awoken yesterday morning by an act of cruelty that extends above and beyond any previous work of villainy.

Prior to 9:00 a.m., and in the midst of morning rush hour, American Airlines flight 11 erupted in flames, as it struck the northern tower of New York's World Trade Center. Less than twenty minutes later, United Airlines flight 175 followed suit, routing itself into the southern tower.

A far cry from the daily chaos of New York, the hours following the tragic event saw the city lose all sense of itself.

"People can't go home, they are just wandering the streets," Richard Barbiera said.

Barbiera, an employee of Prudential Securities located in One New York Plaza, actually witnessed the second crash.

"I couldn't believe my eyes," he said.

After the disaster occurred, Barbiera actually managed to catch the last ferry (approx. 11 o'clock) to Staten Island. At that point most, if not all, means of leaving the island of Manhattan had been cut off. The New York Port Authority shut down all tunnels, bridges and ferries, as they were seen as possible targets.

Besides every federal building being evacuated, other potential targets such as the New York Stock Exchange and the United Nations were closed. As expected most if not every other building in Manhattan was vacated as well.

Astonishment barely scratches the surface of the feelings had by most New Yorkers as college students watched it unfold from outside the city.

"I saw the second building collapse and all I could do was rub my eyes," an anonymous Wagner College student said.

Within hours of the incident, the United States Military was on full alert with an effort to protect the nation's largest city.

Citizens of the five-borough area reported, on many occasions, that U.S. fighter planes were patrolling New York airspace. The Navy also sent a specific number of vessels to the area including a hospital ship to help with the relief effort.

Also aiding in the relief of the injured victims are the citizens of New York who have come out in force to donate blood. On Staten Island, so many civilians have shown up to give blood that some must be turned away due to a lack of resources in Hospitals.

Efforts are also being made to obtain blood from sources outside the city, but in the area of transportation there is a glitch. Nothing can enter the city on the ground because of the immense amounts of traffic and the previously shut down arteries. Also, air traffic is severely restricted in N.Y. airspace so the blood cannot be flown into the city either. But with all the blood donors lining up to assist the cause, a shortage is unlikely.

Less than 24 hours after the most horrific tragedy in United States history, it seems that New Yorkers are uniting to combat tyranny and protect American livelihood.

Governments put to test in wake of national tragedy

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Federal and State governments were reeling yesterday after a series of terrorist attacks on New York City and the Pentagon.

It started in Boston yesterday morning, as American Airlines Flight 11 and United Airlines Flight 175 left Logan Airport.

Flight 11 left Boston for Los Angeles with 81 passengers, nine flight attendants and two pilots, according to a statement released by the airline. United Airlines 175, a Boeing 767 aircraft, departed from Boston at 7:58 a.m., bound for Los Angeles, with 56 passengers on board, two pilots and seven flight attendants, according to a statement by Chief Executive Officer Jim Goodwin.

"We are horrified by these tragic events," said Donald J. Carty, chairman and CEO of American Airlines. "Our thoughts and prayers go out to the families of all involved."

At 8:45 and 9:03 a.m. the planes slammed into World Trade Center One and World Trade Center Two, respectively. At 9:25 a.m. the Federal Aviation Administration ordered a National Ground Stop.

"This is the first time that a National Ground Stop has been ordered by the FAA. No civilian flights are allowed to leave the ground," the Office of Public Affairs for the FAA said. "This does not affect military or law enforcement aircraft. Civilian flights in the air can continue onto their destination or land at the first suitable airport. This is a decision made by the captain and the airline."

Twenty minutes later an American Airlines flight from Dulles bound for San Francisco crashed into the E Ring of the Pentagon outside of Washington, DC.

At around 10 a.m., Central Plaza, the building that houses the Boston field office of the FBI, was evacuated. Eyewitnesses report that the John F. Kennedy Federal building was "cordoned off," and that police with dogs were being sent into Central Plaza.

The FBI was back in the building later in the day though, and expects to be there Wednesday as well. The Pentagon and other government offices are also scheduled to be open.

At 11 a.m. Boston Mayor Thomas Menino, citing City Hall's "proximity to federal and historic buildings in downtown," sent home all non-essential city personnel. City Hall Plaza is located adjacent to the Federal Building, across from the Central Plaza buildings. He emphasized "that all City departments would remain open as needed with senior officials staffing."

Boston Public Schools remained open. The financial district, located near Federal buildings and historic sites, also closed down. That decision, the Mayor's Press Office stressed, was made by the individual building owners.

According to a Massachusetts National Guard spokesperson, they had not been asked to activate as of this afternoon, but, she said, "We are ready, if we are needed."

At 12:50 p.m. the FAA said there were 40-50 aircraft still in the air but that they should be down by 1:00 p.m., and that New York City and Washington DC airports were closed.

The FAA has announced that they will not let any airport open or any civilian aircraft take off until noon on Wednesday. It further stated that there were 22 international flights that were being allowed to land. Other international flights to the United States were diverted to Canada or other foreign airports.

"Logan was shut down around 11 a.m.," a Logan Airport employee, who did not wish to be identified, said. Logan Airport personnel were moved to the Harborside Hyatt Hotel, where a Command Center was set up.

Closer to home, the University of Massachusetts closed its campuses. The Amherst Campus closed at 1 p.m.

"This is a time of extreme national and personal distress for the campus community," Chancellor Marcellette Williams said in a campus-wide email. "Housing Cluster and Area Residence Directors offices have been designated communication and help centers for students who live on campus. The Dean of Students Office has been designated an assistance center for commuter students. Faculty and staff should contact the Faculty and Staff Assistance Program at 545-0350 for additional support."

"The feeling here is we have thousands of students from New York and New Jersey and they can't concentrate on studying geology or math while they are wondering about their families," said Kay Scanlan of the University News Office.

The Department of Defense, located in the Pentagon, issued several statements throughout the day. A part of the outer ring of the Pentagon was destroyed, however, it is not yet known the extent of the damage.

"They are still assessing the damage right now. We're still in an emergency mode," a spokesperson for the Department of Defense said. "Things have calmed down a bit but its still pretty - we're still in an emergency mode."

Those injured in the Pentagon were taken to various area hospitals.

"The Navy has activated the hospital ship USNS Comfort (T-AH 20) this morning," a Navy press release stated. "The Commander in Chief, U.S. Atlantic Fleet, has dispatched the aircraft carriers USS John F. Kennedy (CV 67) and USS George Washington (CVN 73) to New York City where the World Trade Center was also attacked and very heavily damaged."

The USNS Comfort, based in Baltimore, Maryland will leave port today, according to Marge Holtz of the Military Sealift Command.

"We normally have 1,000 beds, but we will only have 500 because we're coming off an inactive period. We have 935 Naval medical personnel, some ours, some from Bethesda or other small hospitals," Holtz said. "She [the Comfort] needs to stop somewhere and pick up some supplies. We're not sure where though; we're talking about that now.

"We're not sure where we are going to be either," Holtz added. "We may be at anchorage, we may be pier side or we may be at Staten Island."

The Comfort is equipped with twelve operating rooms, radiology services, medical laboratories, a pharmacy, a cat scan and two oxygen-producing plants. The Comfort also has its own blood bank and a helicopter pad. In addition, both aircraft carriers can be used as medical and operational centers for emergency personnel. In addition, several destroyers, cruisers and two other aircraft carriers were dispatched from Norfolk Naval Base into the Atlantic.

Currently, the USS Enterprise is on station in the Arabian Gulf. There are 14 ships and approximately 8,220 sailors and marines with the 5th Fleet in that area of operations. The USS Carl Vinson is on station in the Indian Ocean with the 7th Fleet in the Indian Ocean. In the Pacific Ocean is the USS Kitty Hawk. Combined, there are 42 ships and over 25,000 sailors and marines in that area of operations.

President George W. Bush said that the United States would find those responsible for apparent terrorist attacks against the World Trade Center in New York City and the Pentagon.

"I've been in regular contact with the Vice President, Secretary of Defense, the national security team and my Cabinet," President Bush said. "We have taken all appropriate security precautions to protect the American people. Our military at home and around the world is on high alert status and we've taken the necessary security precautions to continue the functions of your government."

Academic leniency

Interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams released a statement last night announcing a policy of academic leniency for the remainder of this week.

"We worried about the feeling of the students, faculty, and staff, feelings not yet expressed... feelings that may not always present in ourselves, but feelings that are all too human," the statement said, referring to Williams' meeting with SGA officials last night which prompted the statement. "While we go forward as a community we must be mindful and respectful of each individual as individual choices are made about how to grieve."

According to SGA President John Sheehan, the statement means that students who miss class or have problems with late papers as a result of grief are to be dealt with in a way that will not negatively impact their academic standing.

"The SGA and Administration's top priority is to advocate on behalf of the students and to ensure their overall well-being," said SGA Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders. "Students should feel comfortable grieving in any way they see fit, even if it means missing class."

FACULTY NEWS ANALYSIS

A policy of neglect and cowardice

Many commentators are describing the disasters in New York, Washington, and Pennsylvania as terrorist attacks – the worst since Pearl Harbor, 60 years ago. None I've seen call them what they are: the predictable result of American policy.

Sixty years ago, Americans ignored the twin threats of Japanese militarism and German National Socialism. That denial resulted in the deaths not only of more than 2,000 sailors in Hawaii, but in the loss of millions of people – and our nearly losing World War II.

Happily, master politician-president Franklin Roosevelt knew Americans' political limits, and moved them skillfully through a "Back Door to War," as historian Charles Beard argued.

This time, denial remains the case, but there is no master politician.

Since the contested election in November and his coronation by the Supreme Court, George W. Bush, first, ignored the suffering of the Palestinians in the Middle East, then urged Israelis and Palestinians to settle their differences by leaving Ariel Sharon to pursue a policy of non-negotiation and state assassinations. When the world, at the U.N. conference in Durban, focused the bankruptcy of our policy, the delegations of both Israel and the United States walked out, rather than deal.

The result is predictable. How can we allow, now for decades, millions of people to live like transients, camped out along the West Bank and Gaza strip, while Sharon and his accomplices settle expropriated land, force the Palestinians out, and assassinate those who vigorously oppose them? How can we fail to see our policy has created zealots and suicide bombers, willing to attack us in our own skies, on our own soil?

The Palestinians' legitimate hopes for peace were raised by the Oslo Accords (signed on yesterday's anniversary), and by dogged efforts over eight years by President Clinton to reach a settlement.

Then came George Bush.

One test of leadership is the capacity to accept the danger, and commit to a just policy for all. Roosevelt, unable to walk, nevertheless convened a joint session of Congress the next day to declare war. He met with Churchill, Stalin, and de Gaulle, secretly, in areas of danger, to finish the war, and achieve the peace.

In contrast, George Bush appeared in Florida yesterday, campaigning for brother Jeb's effort to hold onto the office he used to steal a national election. George Bush said he intends to hunt down the "terrorists."

He then flew Air Force One to Louisiana, taking refuge in a bunker near Omaha, as far from coastal danger as you can run.

How can we expect anything better, when we pursue a policy of neglect? How can we hope for better with a policy-maker who hid out during the Vietnam War, and remains hidden now?

Why are we, then, surprised that a policy of neglect and cowardice results in a pay-off of death for thousands?

How can we be so blind? How long will we remain so?

Profs. M.J. Peterson and Peter Hass of the Political Science dept.

By Catherine Turner
Collegian Staff

There is no question that yesterday's tragic events will have long lasting consequences. It will take time for all of the questions to be answered, all of the rubble to be sifted and the families of the victims to come to terms with their losses.

However, this event will have even broader consequences than just the devastation on American soil. With the crumbling of the twin towers comes a call for changes in American Foreign Policy as well as shifts in international relations throughout the world.

Two University of Massachusetts Political Science professors agreed to comment on the fate of the international system as it now stands. M.J. Peterson, a professor of World Politics, International Institutions and International Political Economy, and Peter Haas, Graduate Program Director as well as a professor of International Relations, both spoke with The Collegian to discuss the state of international relations.

Haas focused his discussion on the relation between the United States and Israel, highlighting the fragile relationship by drawing an analogy between this event and previous incidents.

"It will have an effect on US foreign policy toward Israel, but it's not clear which direction that will go," Haas said. "It's possible to abandon Israel, or we'll bail out tomorrow. When there was an attack during the Reagan administration against a marine barracks in Lebanon, the US pulled out, but the political situation was different. This could be a tactic by a Palestinian group that doesn't want to fight in Israel so they launch a symbolic attack against the United States, as a way to try to undermine US support for Israel. Hard to tell."

He then went on to address the issue of security, citing the preparation for terrorist attacks as a future concern. "This is not the sort of thing that a ballistic missile system is designed to protect against," Haas said. "What it means to international relations is that it is a fundamentally different type of threat to national security than people have been used to thinking about in the past. This is the first incident of this magnitude that has happened in the US. So undoubtedly there will be lots of changes in all sorts of domestic policy about how to prevent terrorism."

Peterson took a different perspective, framing the issue as one of actors on the international stage being state versus non-state actors, and assuming that the terrorist attacks were done by a non-state entity.

"What it does clearly does do is accentuate the arguments and make the case for the people that have argued that non-state groups able to use violence should not be ignored and they can have significant impact on particular situations," Peterson said. "It's interesting that people who have been arguing that national missile defense would not help you against terrorist attacks, and that proposition is now demonstrated. If you're going to deal with terrorists as non-state entities and you're going to deal with them basically as groups or individuals who are engaged in criminal activity, you go back into the paradigm of criminal activity which means you have to attach individual responsibility."

Both of these professors have extensive knowledge and training in the field of international studies, but not even the most veteran international relations specialist can predict how consequences of this event will play out in the upcoming weeks, months, years and even decades, and what impact it will have on the world. However, these teachers do provide unique insight into the events of the day and what issues will undoubtedly be pursued.

Five colleges become one in grieving

By Julie Burrell and Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Outpourings of grief were seen at Amherst, Smith, Hampshire and Mount Holyoke Colleges yesterday, as Five College students mourned for those killed in yesterday's attacks.

All five colleges in the local area held meetings for students, in which professors spoke of political ramifications, and counselors helped deal with the mass outpouring of emotion.

At Amherst College, professors were not required to cancel classes, but many did so. Others held class discussions regarding the attacks.

A college-wide meeting was held at 4 p.m. in Amherst's LeFrak Gymnasium. Professors and students alike addressed the audience.

Tom Gerety, President of Amherst College, began the meeting saying, "this is a day, I suspect, that all of us will remember for the rest of our lives. In the Amherst community particularly, I know that we enter this moment with little idea of who [has been affected] by the attack."

He added that, based on studies of career paths, "tens of Amherst graduates" were likely in the upper floors of the World Trade Center.

"Events like this go beyond a speech, and beyond our understanding," said Margaret Hunt, Professor of History, and Women's and Gender Studies. "We will know all about this tragedy in coming weeks – the death count, and...the damage done to national pride. What we will not know is the mindset needed to [enact this tragedy] on innocent civilians, for a political reason that we don't even know."

Barbara Ehrenreich, author of the recent book Nickle And Dimed: On [Not] Getting by in America, was slated to speak at a lecture at Amherst College yesterday, but the lecture was cancelled in light of the attacks. Ehrenreich chose instead to speak at the campus meeting.

"I share anyone's shock," said Ehrenreich. "I hope to speak about different things. Shock is safe enough to talk about – I want to report [on] some things that are not."

"Let us not compound this tragedy with further tragedies," she said. "There are two potential tragedies right around the corner. There is the temptation to bomb the beejesus out of somebody somewhere, just like Clinton did in Afghanistan and Sudan. I would like other people to join me in saying to our current president: 'Do not bomb a bunch of Afghan peasants who had nothing to do with this!'" Ehrenreich's speech was met with loud cheers from the audience.

"The second tragedy," she went on, "is the possibility of a severe militarization of our society. The attack on freedom is just startling."

Students met later in the day at Johnson Chapel for "Informal conversation."

At Mt. Holyoke College meetings were held in individual residence halls, in which students met with faculty members and professors. A phone bank was established to assist students in receiving incoming phone calls from family members.

A vigil for victims of the attacks was held at the steps of Mt Holyoke's Blanchard Campus Center at 7 p.m.

At Hampshire College, the administration decided yesterday morning to cancel classes. At noon, an all-community meeting was held to discuss the events.

President Gregory S. Prince Jr. said that another meeting is tentatively scheduled for tonight at 7 p.m.

"This is so we can talk about how to support each other," Prince said. "Everybody's numb. I don't think any feelings have set in."

The gathering tonight will bring together the campus for more discussion.

"The most important thing is to understand is that there are people who have experienced loss. This is independent of politics."

At Smith College, an all-college meeting was held last evening at John M. Greene Hall. The administration decided to continue classes and events. However, they may be cancelled at the discretion of individual professors and group leaders. Acting president John Connolly sent emails to the students and faculty that stressed the importance of community support.

"We are all numb from this morning's events," said Connolly. At the meeting, he likened yesterday's events to both Pearl Harbor and the assassination of President Kennedy.

"Shame on us if we take this as license to condemn or hate an entire nation or race," Connolly said.

Alana Vogl, a California native and junior at Smith, echoed the sentiments of many on the Smith campus.

"People are in a state of disbelief," said Vogl. "It's shock."

The theme on all local campuses yesterday was the importance of the community coming together in support. Continued support and counseling will be extended to students on each campus.

A timeline of terrorism

By Melissa Hammel and Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

The magnitude of yesterday's terrorist attacks left many in shock. However, given the escalating frequency of attacks in recent history, the full-scale bombardment that occurred Tuesday spells out a sort of culmination to a disturbing trend in terrorism.

Below is a detailed list of some of the major terrorist assaults on the United States since the last attack on the World Trade Center.

February 26, 1993

In the first terrorist attack against the United States on its own soil, six civilians were killed and over 1,000 injured in a 12:18 p.m. blast that centered on the B2 level of the World Trade Center in New York. The blast came from a homemade bomb loaded in a rented Ryder van, which was parked in the underground parking garage.

The blast knocked out the power plant for the entire complex. Meanwhile, a crater nearly 150 feet in diameter was formed when 50 inch thick steel-reinforced floors were blasted away on three levels. The fire alarm and public address system were both out of service, as well as the emergency lighting system. A total of 124 parked cars were destroyed and 102 more were damaged.

Muslim bombing mastermind Ramzi Yousef, who was later tried and convicted for plotting the attack, targeted the Trade Center due to its symbol of America's wealth and commerce. The 2nd tallest skyscraper in the world was also the headquarters for the Federal Bureau of Investigation's New York division and the Joint Terrorist task force, which had been investigating his group for two years.

Yousef and his group hoped to make Americans feel real terror. They hoped to bring the building crumbling down, but failed. The Trade Center shook, but refused to fall.

The resulting cleanup effort involved 2,700 workers per day utilizing 160,000 gallons of cleaning fluid and 200,000 gallons of detergent and saw 2,500 tons of rubble removed from the site. The restoration cost totaled $250,000,000.

November 13, 1995

A car bomb detonated at U.S. Military Headquarters in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia and killed five United States military personnel in the area.

April 19, 1995

It was seemingly a normal day in Oklahoma City on April 19th when parents dropped off their children for day care at the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in the heart of the city.

To the shock of the nation at approximately 9:05 a.m. a large bomb inside of a rental truck exploded destroying half of the front of the building, collapsing floors and burying victims under layers of steel and concrete.

Before yesterday, the incident was deemed the worst terrorist attack on United States soil, claiming the lives of 168 Americans, a good number of them children and day care workers. Hundreds of others were injured in the blast.

Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols were both charged with the bombing. McVeigh was sentenced to the death and died by means of lethal injection on June 11th of this year. Terry Nichols escaped the death penalty, and instead was served a prison sentence.

Although the motives of the bombing remain unclear both McVeigh and Nichols were ex-military men that developed a strong anti-government sentiment later in their lives. Many believe that the bombing may have been retaliation for the 1992 incident in Waco, Texas where 80 followers of David Koresh were killed in a military ordered attack. McVeigh was also violently opposed to the tragedy at Ruby Ridge, a weeklong standoff between white supremacist Randy Weaver and members of the FBI during which Weaver's wife and child and a number of agents were killed.

Survivors and family members of those killed in the Oklahoma City bombings expressed shock and sent their condolences to those who lost family members in the terrorist attacks yesterday.

"I just can't believe what's happened," Martha Ridley, a woman whose daughter died in the Oklahoma City Bombing exclaimed to NBC. "God, my heart goes out to all of these people, believe me. I just hope that there is justice."

June 25, 1996

A bomb that was placed in a truck outside of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia detonated killing 19 American Servicemen and wounding hundreds of civilians.

Indicted for the incident were members of a little known Saudi Arabian militant group called Hezbollah. The group has denied involvement in yesterday's incident.

August 7, 1998

Terrorist bombs struck U.S. Embassies in Nairobi, Kenya and Dar es Salceni, Tanzania on August 7th 1998 killing 224 people 11 of them Americans in a violent attack.

Thousands of people were injured when truck bombs exploded outside of the Embassies. The United States government charged seventeen people for alleged involvement in the bombing. Among these individuals is Usama Bin Laden, a suspect in yesterday's terrorist attacks on Washington D.C., New York City and Somerset County, Pennsylvania.

Bin Laden, a Saudi Arabian fugitive, has made a number of attacks on Americans and on the United States. He once made a public statement in a fatwa, explaining that "Americans must die, the sooner the better."

He vowed that with the help of Islamic terrorists that he would remove U.S. troops from Saudi Arabia.

He explained to ABC news that their goal was to, "send the bodies of American troops and civilians home in wooden boxes and coffins. We don't differentiate between those dressed in military uniforms and civilians they are all targets in this fatwa."

A force to be reckoned with, bin Laden has nearly five billion dollars in his family construction business, experienced troops and a track record. He is thought to be connected to Ramzi Yousef, the man convicted of the bombing of the World Trade Center. He is also thought to be behind the bombing of a Saudi base in Riyadh that was responsible for the deaths of six Americans.

October 12, 2000

The USS Cole was attacked while at port in Aden, Yemen, for refueling. A small harbor skiff loaded with explosives pulled alongside the destroyer and detonated, killing 17 sailors and injuring 39 more. The explosion tore a hole into the side of the Cole and nearly sank the ship nicknamed "Determined Warrior."

Restoration from the suicide bombing should cost about $240 million, while repairs and improvements will cost another $150 million and $90 million respectively.

Thirty-one arrests were made in connection with the bombing, but the investigation was essentially forced to a halt in August when Yemen refused to extend the inquiry to include Islamic militant groups within Yemen. Some believe the decision was made to keep the FBI from conclusively linking the bombing to Osama bin Laden, who has declared a "holy war" against the United States.

The Yemen officials have announced their intentions to close the case by trying the first six men arrested soon after the attack despite a video that surfaced in June that alluded to bin Laden's role in the attack on the U.S. vessel.

United States officials bought full-page ads in Yemeni papers offering a $5 million reward for information leading to the arrests of those responsible for the attack on the Cole, but the Telecommunications Ministry intention ally gave the wrong phone numbers for the local U.S. Embassy.

Heroes from the Cole were honored on September 6 in Norfolk, VA. A total of 149 officers and enlisted personnel are set to receive 154 awards as a result of the attack.

As long as the United States is seen as the "watchdog" for the rest of the world it will consistently be under threat of attack as it has been in the past.

A wounded nation asks: what now?

By Matthew F. Sacco and Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

In the wake of what is possibly the most dreadful act of tyranny in the history of the United States, the American public is begging the question, "what now?"

Some citizens are taking action towards helping the relief effort by donating blood at local hospitals.

"Several people from [the Staten Island Civil Court], including court officers and attorneys, went up to nearby St. Vincent's Hospital to give blood soon after the tragedy occurred," Court Attorney Helene Donlan Sacco said.

From the time the two aircraft slammed into the upper portions of the World Trade Center towers yesterday morning, the American Red Cross was on the move to provide blood and medical assistance to those in need.

The Red Cross, upon hearing the news, activated its Aviation Incident Response (AIR) and dispatched teams to the area of the Pentagon, New York City, and to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, all areas affected by the tragedy. The Red Cross has nearly 80,000 blood donations within its inventory to send to affected areas in order to try to assist in the situation.

The problem is that with no air traffic to New York and all other means of transportation into the city shut down, there is seemingly no way for New York hospitals to receive blood from outside sources.

"The American Red Cross is doing everything we can to ensure the immediate availability of the safest possible blood," said Dr. Bernadine Healy, president and CEO of the American Red Cross in a statement. "We are also dispatching hundreds of trained disaster workers and mental health counselors to New York, Washington D.C. and elsewhere."

In New York City, chaos has erupted as individuals have tried to give blood and offer medical assistance. Bellevue Hospital in New York is being used as headquarters for the medical response for injured individuals within the city. Lines have been pushed out the door as concerned New York residents have waited several hours to give blood to injured victims.

According to Sacco, less than an hour after the event the line for blood donations on Staten Island was enormous.

"The wait was more than two hours long," she said, "The hospital was forced to turn people away because they lacked the resources to handle so many blood donors."

The traffic jams at blood banks are nothing compared to the gridlock citizens are facing as they attempt to evacuate cities and buildings across the nation.

In the targeted cities, most of the major buildings, landmarks and transit outlets have been shut down. In New York, besides the obvious destruction of the World Trade Center, virtually all places of business have allowed and urged their employees to leave the island of Manhattan. Lower Manhattan itself was closed off in order to allow access for emergency vehicles with many people being forced to leave the area on foot by walking across the Brooklyn Bridge. Bridges, tunnels, ferries and most other outlets were all closed by the New York Port Authority.

Despite the Port Authority's decree that all arteries leading off the island would be closed, an attempted mass exodus off of Manhattan could not be prevented.

"Everyone's just wandering around, kind of stunned," said Bradley Phillips, who owns and operates a liquor store in mid-town Manhattan. "What's the point of trying to get out now?"

Most federal buildings were evacuated immediately after the attack. The United Nations was also closed, as well as the New York Stock Exchange.

In Washington, D.C., the Pentagon, the White House, The State Department, the Justice Department, the Capital, the CIA and all other government buildings were evacuated soon after the Pentagon attack.

All nationwide flights were held at their departure airports, marking the first ever national ground stop. All international flights were re-routed into Canada.

Other evacuated buildings and sites outside the target areas include the Philadelphia landmarks, Sears Tower in Chicago, Center for Disease Control in Atlanta (for fear of Bio-chemical warfare), the Los Angeles International Airport. Disney also evacuated all of its parks.

All United States borders are on high alert.

The United States Military is also on high alert status, with a significant number of ships placed along the east coast and U.S. fighters being scrambled in New York City airspace. The Air Force has orders to shoot down any suspicious looking aircrafts flying over the United States.

The Navy has also deployed one of its hospital ships to New York to help with the relief.

"I was walking down Castleton avenue [a main street in Staten Island] and I saw two or three fighters fly over head," Sacco said.

With the quick response of the U.S. armed forces to protect the Nation's borders and skies, there is an obvious fear of another attack.

"At one point it was really bizarre because a plane flew over head and people just started panicking," Gary Valente said about his experience outside New York's Grand Central Station. "That must have been right around the time the second tower collapsed."

Even after the attacks have seemingly come to a halt, there is still much apprehension across the Nation. With a myriad of groups boasting involvement in the attack and reports of repeated bomb threats, safety is a priority not yet accomplished.

"I do not believe [the terrorists] were aware of the consequences of their actions," Sacco said. "They were aware of the carnage it would cause I am sure, but not of the power of the American will."

SGA does its part to help

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

In the wake of the destruction of the World Trade Center, the Student Government Association (SGA) is doing all that it can to soften the emotional blow to University of Massachusetts' students.

The focus of the SGA, according to Aarun Saunders, Speaker of the Senate, is that "students who were directly affected (by the incident) are taken care of."

Saunders admits, "It's absolutely horrendous. (It's) incomprehensible, the state of shock on the campus. (I) can't fathom the loss of life."

"We all know someone who is very close to what happened. We all have someone who is there," said SGA President John Sheehan. The SGA phoned in to Peter Pan Charter Bus Company to make sure bussing was available to students that needed to get back home to New York as well as contacted Yankee Candle to donate a couple thousand candles for the vigil held last night by the campus pond.

UMass Auxiliary Services and many RSO's were extremely helpful yesterday morning by providing coffee, juice and pastries for students and faculty while they were watching the televisions set up in the Student Union. "There is an incredible sense of community. With everything that happened, what else can you ask for? They have been very good to us," praised Sheehan.

Jon Laubinger, SGA Student Trustee, expressed his sorrow, "It's a tragedy for everyone across the world, especially those students' families, friends and loved ones in these places. My heart goes out to them, the SGA's heart goes out to them."

Laubinger also praised the efforts of Saunders for he was the one to contact Peter Pan and Yankee Candle. He said, "He is very thoughtful of students."

The SGA has contacted Mental Health Services to counsel those students in need and is also concerned with the safety of UMass students, especially the Pro-Palestine Action Council, and wants to make sure students know where to go. Students can seek help from religious leaders on campus as well as Housing Services and the Dean of Students. They also fear the "backlash on Middle Eastern Students and students with Middle Eastern features," said Laubinger.

"The last thing we want is a violent situation where students are targeted and victimized. We want an open and healthy dialogue," said Saunders.

Sheehan informed the Daily Collegian that he made the request yesterday to cancel classes for the rest of the day and at press time the status on today's classes was not yet in.

Saunders admits, "Campus has to come together. This is when we'll see what kind of people we have here."

My name is Frederick Bloom. I graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1971 and the New England College of Optometry in 1975. I am very proud of the University Health Service Eye Care Services and the high quality of eye care delivered to more than 80,000 individuals over the last 25 years.

I have been on the teaching faculty of the New England College of Optometry and co-authored an article with Dr. Abel, a UHS physician, that was published in a national optometry journal. In addition, I am credentialed in diagnostic and therapeutic ocular pharmaceuticals by the Massachusetts Board of Optometry.

EYE CARE SERVICES INCLUDE:
- Routine eye examinations
- A new onsite eye glass service
- Emergency eye care
- Full service contact lens care
- Co-management of laser refractive surgery

Our staff takes great pride in being able to fit many people who have had difficulty in the past wearing contact lenses.

Patient feedback of those who have used the UHS Eye Care Services over the years has been consistently excellent.

How a nation interprets a tragedy

University unsure how to deal with disaster

By Nicholas Pizzolato
Collegian Staff

In a generation where our information comes from The Daily Show and Conan O'Brien, a catastrophic act like yesterday's takes us all by surprise. Shock, worry, and fear attack every person despite race, sex, and creed. But just how does our generation look at this event?

In total honesty, was your first thought, "How could this happen?" We have seen films like The Siege, Air Force One, and the upcoming Arnold Schwarenegger film Collateral Damage that explore the violence and terrorist acts that threaten the United States. These films made terrorism and fighting seem like fun and an adventure. We have learned that it's not.

The sad thing is these films have taught us to laugh at such serious threats. Lines like "Get off my plane!" and "I am the Law!" make us laugh off the serious nature of such attacks. We have been exposed to all of this before, but never took it seriously. Now it's happened, to not only one national landmark, but also three American icons. No one feels safe, as students are somber in mourning. Across campus, people have their heads down in silent prayer unable to move, but others are laughing at a joke or a situation, unaware or just don't care about the tragedy that happened less than three hours ago as I write this.

The skyline of New York City will never be the same. No longer when I cross the Throgs Neck Bridge will I see the majesty of the two glimmering castles of the island of Manhattan.

Films that have shown America under attack have been in increased demand. Not only do the films make us feel good, when the bad guys are thwarted but we honestly believe that no such attack could happen. It's easy to sympathize with someone onscreen, when they are under attack but what about in real life? In the last ten to fifteen years over a dozen films have played with the idea of terrorism against the United States. These are the films that have huge opening box office grosses and have launched or given rebirth to some stars.

I know that many of you think that rebuilding will be easy. You may think that in two months the World Trade Center buildings will be back up bigger and better than ever. This is also a myth given to us by Hollywood. The sad truth is that it may never be the same. If the building is rebuilt it won't be the twin towers anymore, and no one knows when reconstructing will begin, because unlike Hollywood, that is the last thing on peoples' minds.

In the movies people die, you don't know them but they do. In real life not only may you know the people who died, but you probably know someone that knows someone that was injured or who passed.

Face it students, we are desensitized to the point where it's almost sick. We don't know what emotions to feel or how to cope. We can't turn to Arnold Schwarenegger or Bruce Willis to save the day. No one can save the day. In the movies there is an ending. There is an event that will end the film on a relatively positive note. A laugh or a theme song that will resonate in our head for hours until we just plain forget about it later that night. This time we will not forget, and there is no positive energy. The lights don't fade up and we don't throw away our bags of popcorn. This is real people. This is real! We just don't know what's going to happen. There is a sense of uneasiness across a room, a building, the campus, and the country. All we know is that for now, we need to cope. The question is do we know how to?

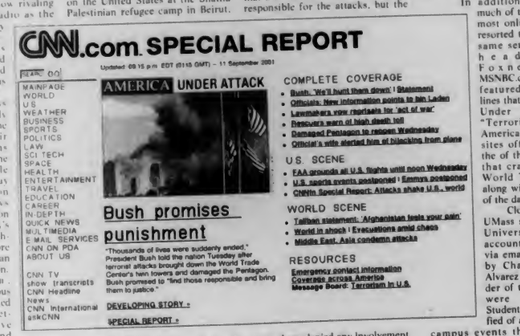
Internet offers faster (better?) event coverage

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

With the internet now rivaling both television and radio as the choice of many Americans for news, coverage of Tuesday's attacks on the United States was continuous and instantaneous on nations online news sites.

All of the major news websites were easily accessible considering the huge demand on their servers as Americans clamored for news on the day's events. If people found themselves away from a television Tuesday, internet news sites offered description and analysis of the day's events in a timely fashion, and perhaps a more convenient fashion than was offered on television.



ABCnews.com, MSNBC.com and various other websites connected to the broadcast networks offered live streaming video and audio of their television broadcasts in addition to up-to-the-minute news stories and analysis. MSNBC.com offered chilling photos of Palestinians celebrating the attacks on the United States at the Shatila Palestinian refugee camp in Beirut.

MSNBC.com also reported that an anonymous caller told an Abu Dhabi television station earlier on Tuesday that a radical Palestinian group was responsible for the attacks, but the group later denied any involvement.

Yahoo.com was another timely and complete source for the day's news offering a collection of stories from sources ranging from Reuters and the AP.

In addition to offering much of the same news, most online news sites resorted to many of the same sensationalistic headlines. Foxnews.com, MSNBC.com and others featured flashy headlines that read "America Under Attack" or "Terrorism Hits America." Most of the sites offered video of the of the second plane that crashed into the World Trade Center, along with other videos of the day's terror.

Closer to home, all UMass students with a University email account were notified via email at 1:00 p.m. by Chancellor Rosio Alvarez that the remainder of the day's classes were cancelled. Students were also notified of a vigil, and other campus events that were being planned due to the day's events.

Television journalism tries to make sense of horrific disaster

By Nicholas Pizzolato and Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

Without a doubt the events that took place yesterday are representative of terrible acts that no one could ever imagine. And in this time of sadness and disbelief, we the public turn to the media to keep us informed in a timely and truthful fashion. Journalism professor B.J. Roche said, "Every generation has a story that they don't forget. Ours was the assassination of JFK, this is yours." As scary and foreboding is that is, it is true. Henry Kissinger compared it to the bombing of Pearl Harbor, but in some senses this is even worse. Without warning a horrible and tragic attack on three American landmarks has left our country scared and fascinated to learn all they can about the event. To learn if they know anyone hurt, or how they can help. To learn who has taken responsibility and what the Bush administration will do to defend the country. To learn, the American people can really do one thing and that is watch the news.

There is endless replay of the collapse of the World Trade Center towers, and pictures from the Pentagon. Tape of people getting caught by clouds of debris, dust, and ash. Shots of the mass exodus from Manhattan to New Jersey dominated the television screen. It's tough for us to watch, but we do, so we can indeed realize the horror and tragedy of the act.

CNN was very much in control from the beginning. The correspondents were professional and didn't seem to be barging into the street to harass scared victims. It was when the terrifying images showed the second plane crash into the second tower and then the realization that both buildings had collapsed that took everyone's breath away.

Despite the professionalism that CNN showed, it was still very discomforting to see the endless replays of the buildings being reduced to rubble. The famed New York skyline will never be the same. And as everyone huddled around a monitor, there was an uneasy silence as reports came in. A plane had hit the Pentagon. All of the nation's flights had been grounded, a first in the history of commercial aviation. Shots of the rolling fields of Somerset county, eighty miles southeast of Pittsburgh. The audience was always kept informed of the verified and unconfirmed reports from the field. And although we did not want to know every single piece of information, they told us anyway.

CNN gave the viewing public a barrage of guests and special analysts. These included Governor Pataki of New York and Mayor Rudolph Giuliani. Henry Kissinger explained what he would do as a Secretary of State and gave some points of advice to Bush and his Cabinet.

CNN was able to find a lucky survivor from the disaster. Matthew Cornelous, a port authority worker, was on the 65th floor when the building shuddered. They all thought that a plane had hit the building but no one was sure. Everyone was surprisingly calm, and he even heard somebody laughing. They also had a maintenance worker who was helping to bring down a gurney from the 39th floor.

As the day came went on, more footage poured into CNN including a cameraman who was sandwiched by a cloud of smoke. Shots from CNN's cameras on top of buildings got people's reaction during and after the event. And at the time of press, no one really has any answers but reports of groups claiming and denying responsibility continue to make news.

ABC News, which was broadcasting a live shot of The World Trade Center at 9 a.m. when the second plane crashed into it, offered continuous commercial-free coverage throughout the day. It featured constant interviews with experts as well as video of the fires. Fox, NBC, and CBS also all offered live coverage in a similar manner. All of the networks not only broadcasted the latest news as it happened, but also spent a fair time speculating who might be behind the attacks.

The networks' Boston affiliates offered solid local coverage of the day's events that was heightened by the fact that two of the planes that crashed departed from Boston's Logan Airport. WCVB (ABC), WHDH (NBC), and WBZ (CBS) all showed a brief interview with the brother of one of the American Airlines pilots- a Dracut, Massachusetts resident - killed in the crash. All of the Boston stations cut away from the national coverage to offer local updates on information pertaining to the flights from Logan Airport.

If one was caught only with a radio as their news source on Tuesday, coverage was best on the news/talk stations as expected. All of the major FM stations from Hartford, New Haven and Springfield also offered coverage of the events, cutting out all music during the afternoon offering live coverage of press conferences, and cut-ins from national news services that the stations subscribe to.

NCAA News Release

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Tuesday, September 11, 2001

NCAA STATEMENT ON INTERCOLLEGIATE CONTESTS

INDIANAPOLIS---The NCAA is being asked today if college football and other intercollegiate contests will be played given the tragic events unfolding in the country today. Our thoughts and concerns are with everyone affected, and we believe it is important to focus on the safety of people nationwide.

Conferences and individual schools have authority to determine whether to play regular season games. Given questions from the media and inquiries being received from our member schools and conferences, the NCAA is engaged in discussions with college presidents and conference commissioners to assist them in making decisions about conducting athletics contests, particularly college football games over the next several days.

"The games themselves are insignificant in the face of what has happened today," said Cedric Dempsey, NCAA president. "Our focus is entirely on the safety of student-athletes, athletics personnel and fans. We urge schools to make sound decisions about proceeding with contests today and in the coming days."

The NCAA will cooperate with any executive orders that may be issued by the President.

Athletic world must pause in wake of tragedy

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

Like the schedules of countless operations throughout the country, the sports world's agenda stalled Tuesday due to the unprecedented terrorist attacks.

Excluding the 1994 work stoppages, Major League Baseball erased an entire day of regular-season play for the first time since D-Day, 1944. Fifteen games were cancelled yesterday and officials around the league expect more shut downs Wednesday, although no official decision has been made.

"In the interest of security and out of a sense of deep mourning for the national tragedy that has occurred today, all Major League Baseball games for today have been cancelled," Commissioner Allan H. (Bud) Selig said in a released statement. "I will continue to monitor the situation on a daily basis and make ongoing decisions accordingly.

"My deepest sympathy and prayers go out to the families and victims of this horrendous series of events."

Security is baseball's main concern in deciding whether or not to remove the schedule lock. Given the demands for law enforcement in certain areas, it will be difficult for the League to ensure safety at events in the immediate future.

These qualms could halt Major League Baseball from finishing its 162-game schedule for the first time since the 1994 lockout. Rescheduling games will be difficult, as several teams have no remaining days off from now until the final day of the schedule.

The hesitancy to continue play extends to the National Football League, which is presently pondering postponement of this weekend's contests.

"Regarding Sunday's games, we will make no decision today [Tuesday]," league spokesman Joe Browne said. "We'll gather information and speak to several parties within the next 24 to 48 hours."

Miami Dolphins president Eddie Jones offered the following: "During this time of tragedy, our thoughts and prayers are with the victims of this terrible event. We are in contact with the NFL regarding the decision-making process surrounding this weekend's games, and until we have a definitive word from the league, as difficult as it may be, our staff is preparing to play this Sunday."

The PGA Tour has already cancelled play Thursday at the World Golf Championship and two other tournaments.

"We will continue to monitor this situation, and make any further adjustments to our tournament schedules that appear to be appropriate or necessary," PGA Tour Commissioner Tim Finchem said.

Major League Soccer Commissioner Don Garber announced all four regular season games scheduled for Wednesday have been postponed.

The National Hockey League has closed its New York offices, and at least three teams, including the New York Rangers, are in the process of adjusting their fall camp schedules.

Los Angeles Kings director of pro scouting, Ace Bailey, was one of two organization members on one of the flights that crashed into the World Trade Center today, a family member has confirmed. Beginning his 32nd year as either an NHL player or scout, Bailey played for Boston, Detroit, Washington, and Edmonton.

The NCAA hasn't cancelled any intercollegiate contests, but has reminded conferences and individual schools that they have the "authority to determine whether to play regular season games." And many have done so. The standing of this weekend's Division I football games will be determined Wednesday. Thursday night's Penn State-Virginia, Ohio-North Carolina and Texas Tech-UTEP games have already been postponed.

The University of Massachusetts had no scheduled games today. The school's next planned events are for Friday.

America under attack:
a community responds

The unthinkable tragedy that shook the United States early yesterday, as planes struck both the north and south towers of the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., set not only this country back on its heels, but the world, as each update pushed the impact of the attack further around the globe.

"Make no mistake," said President George W. Bush in a statement yesterday afternoon, "the United States will hunt down and punish those responsible for these cowardly acts."

The address, which came at 1:04 p.m. from an undisclosed location, promised the citizens of the United States that the full resources of our federal government will be concentrated on defense, even as countless stories continued to unfold around us.

Those stories, from the damage inflicted upon two of our most visible and prominent landscapes, to the personal devastation for each individual within reach of the story, rapidly sketched out a wide-reaching path across our conscious.

For those in the vicinity of the attacks, who have witnessed firsthand the enormous loss of human lives, and in a single moment watched the course of a day tragically shift, the account must transcend thought, and will for quite some time. It's something that only touches the outermost corners of our nightmares. It's something we can usually put out of mind by shutting off our television sets.

There will be no putting this incident out of mind. It's struck all of us, regardless of location, in a way we're not used to being rubbed. It has forced us to acknowledge what we take for granted, and take into account what matters to us most.

The University of Massachusetts community is no exception to that. Students solemnly filled the halls of the Student Union yesterday, captured by the glow of unimaginable news. The unnatural quiet of this Monday afternoon was dominated by the uncertain voices from the television, the scattered images, and the unease of a campus whose sense of safety had just been horrifically compromised.

Some of us are watching this with a sickness inside, hurt but still detached, slowly digesting the news as it continues to filter in.

Some of us have been placed in positions of extreme unrest, left waiting to hear on the safety of family, friends and other close relations.

All of us, however, have been left to pick up the pieces, to gather together what courage remains to try and make sense of something that should not have happened; something that has knocked our instilled sense of freedom over and shattered our expectations of what just another day can bring.

The problems that plague us on a daily basis have been relegated to shallow afterthoughts. Life, as always, will continue on, but with an immeasurable hole that will forever be questioned, and never filled.

Dealing with the aftermath

ROB SCHULZE

I first heard it on the radio while driving to campus. I thought it was a joke.

Then I realized that it wasn't, and that the morning idiots on 99.5 weren't just yanking my chain. Two planes had crashed into the Word Trade Center, one in each tower.

I wasn't too shocked, to be honest. I thought it was a random accident, that something had gone wrong. It didn't occur to me that there were any anti-American plots about. Tragic, but kind of funnin a way, you know? When I think about that train of thought now I feel lower than dirt.

Then, after my first class, I heard about the plane in Pittsburgh. I heard about the car bomb at the state department. Things got more serious, but I still tried to laugh it off. Rationalization just know – laughing at tragedy will make it all better, right?

Waiting for my next class the rumors flew. The towers had collapsed, it was the same terrorists as before. Bush gave a crappy speech. I had no idea. I made a crack about us going to war and how I was grateful to be a draft age American male, but I was really serious. I don't want to die in the Middle East for George Bush anymore, than yesterday's victims wanted to die for a terrorist's cause. I tried to remember if my cousin Maura in Boston had been on a plane this morning.

Still in a journalism class with a bunch of majors and a few of Collegian workers, we did what we do: talked about the news. No one really knew anything, but we talked about it anyway. We tried to anticipate some of the consequences. I was worried about a backlash against Muslims or just people of Middle Eastern descent (along the lines of what happened to Japanese Americans during World War II), someone mentioned the economy of the US going into the crapper, we wondered if the Air Force would shoot down another hijacked plane (as we then thought there was). I maintained that it was the right thing to do – if the passengers were going to die anyways, why not prevent them from taking other innocents with them? Then I made a joke revolving around George Bush being like the Harrison Ford character from Air Force One and making a daring rescue.

That would be the last joke I made, as the professor came and said that class was cancelled. One of our fellow students had just heard the news, and her boyfriend worked on one of the high floors of one of the Twin Towers. She had run away in tears.

That was when I realized just what had happened. It wasn't a scene from a movie. It was real. There were human lives that were lost, and would never be found again. I found that I, myself, was close to tears. When, as was inevitable, I went to the Collegian office to get a handle on this thing, I was overcome. I found myself outside of myself, hashing one of the metal file cabinets with my fist over and over. Unable to stop. It didn't change anything. It didn't make me feel any better. I just couldn't think of anything else to do.

As the day wore on, I was totally wrapped up in arranging the coverage for the paper which you are currently reading – so much so that I never had time to actually watch the news myself. I was sending reporters here and there and finding meetings and tracking down John Sheehan (who was absolutely great that day, I might add) and I never personally saw anything happening in New York and Washington and Pittsburgh.

Then, running through the business department, I saw Manhattan on the television wreathed in smoke. I stopped and looked around. I set my jaw and resumed walking.

This still wasn't real to me.

Then, later, I gave in. People I knew closely had relatives on those planes. Relatives who worked in the Pentagon. Friends in DC, friends in the Big Apple, friends that might be dead.

Dead.

I watched the coverage. I saw it on TV. I saw my friend's tears as he left to try and get some news.

I couldn't take it. I found myself again hitting the cabinet and then leaning on a shelf, face buried in my hands, sobbing. I don't have the right to be upset. No one I know died, I think. But I can't help it.

"...I saw Manhattan on the television wreathed in smoke. I stopped and looked around. I set my jaw and resumed walking. This still wasn't real to me."

SAM WILKINSON

At 9:00 a.m. yesterday morning, my biggest concern was getting over the Coolidge Bridge to pick up my friend Julie for classes. There was too much traffic and the police were looking the other way when errant drivers made dangerous mistakes. On the back roads, there was fog literally snaking up from the ground, through the trees that broke the fields.

At 9:15 a.m., I was stuck in traffic with Julie, and I turned to take her to Bartlett so she wouldn't be late.

At 9:20 a.m. I came into my office through a backdoor and was told that two planes had been steered into the World Trade Center.

I remember when I was much younger and Waco burned to the ground. After some fifty days, after constant news coverage, after repeated and ongoing attempts to lure David Koresh from his Texas compound, the building burned after an assault on it. I remember sitting with my friends Zach and Colin, watching the conflagration and listening to the experts talk about the devastation.

Then, on a crisp autumn day, I went to Zack and Colin's and they told me when they met me at the door that there'd been an explosion in Oklahoma. Their mother was home and she was concerned, so we sat watching the coverage of a building that was half gone. Literally, there was a building and we could see through the camera lens the twisted metal that covered people's offices. People would run by the cameras bleeding, injured, screaming. And silently, this building sat, gone.

Yesterday morning at the Collegian office, every one of our employees sat around the television, staring in a mute horror. I went to class and students, staff and faculty surrounded every television I passed, watching, stunned. This couldn't be happening. And it couldn't get worse than the footage I'd seen before class; a second plane suddenly hitting the tower and a horrible explosion. I went to my class and professor John Brigham was subdued. He lectured for a few minutes about rights and then said he wouldn't go on. He kept making allusions to the crash and the "people who would steer planes into buildings." He dismissed us very early, but before he did, the girl next to me innocently raised her hand and asked what had happened.

"The World Trade Center has been blown up," he said.

"In Boston?"

"No, in New York."

She seemed relieved for a minute because it wasn't Boston. Just for a minute though, because the professor said she shouldn't be relieved, and then she wasn't. She didn't seem to realize the gravity of her innocence at the news. She hadn't seen the television, she hadn't heard the news; she just didn't know. I was angry because our professor gave her the impression the World Trade Center had actually been blown up. I didn't know it actually would collapse. And our professor was clearly shaken.

As I write this, it is 10:52 a.m., and Pentagon and State Departments have been hit and one of the two World Trade Center towers is literally gone. And now the second tower is gone. It just came over the news and this is what I heard, but didn't see:

"We saw people in building, looking up at the explosion, and suddenly, two people jumped as the building started shaking, and then a third person, and then the building collapsed."

This is happening so quickly. There was fog this morning. There was traffic and fog and I was late and frustrated and just wanted to have a slow day. I can't even begin to comprehend how many people are dead right now that wanted the same thing.

I cannot fathom that this is happening. I cannot understand it. I cannot understand what I keep hearing and desperately trying to read about. I click www.cnn.com a thousand times because I want an explanation that isn't going to be there.

I keep seeing video on the television. I saw the World Trade Center literally collapse before my eyes, like it was supposed to. I saw the plane hit the building on a video shot by somebody underneath the building. And there are shots of people walking in ash, covered, screaming at reporters asking them callous questions.

"Did you see any blood," someone asks, and a black woman looks back at the camera and the reporter behind. "Everywhere," she says, hiking up her skirt. It flows down her red, crimson, flecked with gray.

It is 3:44 p.m. It is 3:45. It is 3:46.

DAN LAMOTHE

It was hell on earth. The World Trade Center towers were reduced to a pile of rubble, with thousands of people trapped, crushed and tormented beneath. The Pentagon building was all but destroyed; amid the flames and explosions, there was panic within. Airports were closed. Campuses were closed. Disney World was closed. I repeat, Disney World was closed.

This is not a joke. None of this is made up. It's all real. Take a deep breath and swallow hard. Remember the day, just like our parents and grandparents remember the day that Kennedy was shot.

America is searching for answers as to how this all could have happened, and the best explanation right now is that there isn't one. The bottom line is that, truthfully, honestly and realistically, nothing more could have been done to protect our United States of America from this horrific event. We did everything we could. Sometimes in life, things quite simply cannot be prevented. It is something that America as a whole is going to have to cope with and grow from.

No nation is infallible, no country invincible, and no society unflawed. Since the fall of Communism, the United States' public has had this huge chip on its shoulder. We all bought into it. We all loved it. We all forgot how quickly things can change. Dennis Leary personified the arrogance that many of us as Americans had. We always felt that America was safe from this kind of horror, because "We've got the bombs, ok???"

The reality is that with the proper planning, anything is possible. Terrorists do not give up; they do not go away. Now, we all realize that. While each and every one of us was involved in the petty nuances of our insignificant lives, a hateful group of people plotted and schemed misery on thousands. Then they pulled it off. It seems simple enough, looking at it in retrospect. It's been accomplished in fiction hundreds of times by authors like Tom Clancy, so why couldn't it happen to America in reality?

Terrorism is always a threat, anywhere we go, anywhere we live – welcome to life. There will always be people that want to rule the world and there will always be people that want to slay the "Great Satan" that they consider America. It took a tragedy that was this big to take our swagger away, but it's gone now.

So what do we do? We go on living our lives – otherwise terrorism has already won. The whole purpose and process to terrorism is to strike fear in the hearts of every day folk, to take away the naive security blanket that we have all carried from day one of our births and replace it with an insecure belief fear that our government, society, and world will fail us. We can't let that happen. Regardless of the damages inflicted and the pain and suffering that this atrocity causes, we have to remember to hold our heads up high. We won't win if we hide under our bed waiting for everything to be ok again.

The group responsible for all of this sat back and watched the carnage unfold yesterday with glee, and not just the explosions and the body counts. Their act is far reaching and they know it. The ugly traffic and road rage in East Coast cities, the empty blood banks in Washington D.C. and New York City, the busy signals that people got for hours while they tried to get information from airports about flights that their families were on – they were all added benefits to the act of hatred that they committed. More than anything else, terrorists want to see Americans turn against Americans. The thing else, terrorists want to see Americans turn against Americans. The more we distrust one another, the further apart we grow and the weaker we become in preventing future incidents of this magnitude.

It is OK for us to be angry. It is OK for us to be afraid. They are reasonable reactions; they just need to be harnessed. We cannot jump to conclusions and scapegoat groups such as the Islamic Nation for the tragedy, because we do not know the facts, details, and background information on all that has happened yet. Inflicting vigilante justice on innocent people while we are at a loss for what to do will only enhance the hatred that terrorism is about. America will grow stronger from this, without a doubt. Our democracy falling to pieces is not an issue. As horrid as this is, do not overreact to it. Reflect on it and learn from it, just like the rest of your country.

Remembering...

Students held a night-time vigil last night in mourning over Tuesday's attacks

Boston hotels raided; blood banks swamped

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The nation was still in shock yesterday, as investigators and rescue workers sifted through the rubble after Tuesday's attacks. In and around Boston, teams of Federal, state, and local police forces stormed two hotels, the Westin-Copley Hotel in Back Bay and the Park Inn at Chestnut Hill, in Newton.

In Boston, Allison Gilbert, a Copley employee, thought it was going to be a normal workday after Tuesday's tragedy. That all changed around 12:30 p.m.

"A bunch of SWAT teams and dogs and EMTs and regular police entered the building and some undercover detectives were in the lobby area," Gilbert said. "They said that they had two suspects on the sixteenth floor."

The police went up the elevators then she said, but then left the hotel and returned.

"Some of the bomb and SWAT teams got some more supplies or whatever," Gilbert said. "They came back with shields and vests and all that."

For forty-five minutes, police were on the upper floors and throughout the hotel. Then, Gilbert said, the building was evacuated of employees and guests.

"They evacuated us because they said there was a bomb scare," Gilbert said. "There were like thousands of people outside, the streets were full of people. That was the reason I didn't go outside at first. People were trying to get in at first, because they wanted to see what was going on and the police were keeping them back."

Although police said there were two suspects, Gilbert did not see anyone in custody come out the front of the building.

"The cops never came out the front door," Gilbert said. "I was standing there inside and it was scary, but I thought they would just get the suspects and get them out. It was scarier when they said there might be a bomb. At 3:30 or 4 p.m. I tried to go back in but they still weren't letting people into the building."

The Boston Field Office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation refused to comment on Wednesday's activities saying only that "the White House is coordinating all public information at the national level."

The White House had no knowledge of any raids on any Boston area hotels, and referred to the Department of Justice.

"No information has been released to us as to that," a White House spokeswoman said.

Calls to the Department of Justice were not returned as of press time.

Meanwhile, a spokesman for the Boston Police Department declined to comment, saying that the incidents Wednesday were the jurisdiction of the FBI, as is the rest of the investigation in the Boston area.

"The Feds are running this one," the Media Relations officer said. "If they ask for our assistance, we give it."

FBI Headquarters in Washington DC would not confirm or comment on Wednesday's incidents in Boston, but only because "I haven't been told anything about that. No arrests have been made yet. I think they're getting many leads I'm not sure how many are considered significant, but we're getting many, many, many, many leads."

Boston blood banks and donation centers have been swamped with willing donors.

Beth Israel Deaconess spokesman Jerry Berger explained why blood is so crucial to Boston right now.

"What's happening is that the Red Cross is diverting its resources to New York and they've told us that they can't help us," Berger said.

Dr. Bernadine Healy, president and CEO of the American Red Cross, explained the decision.

"The American Red Cross is doing everything we can to ensure the immediate availability of the safest possible blood," said Dr. Healy. "We are also dispatching hundreds of trained disaster workers and mental health counselors to New York, Washington D.C. and elsewhere.

"The American Red Cross is standing by to rush tens of thousands of blood products and is dispatching hundreds of trained disaster personnel to New York City and Washington D.C. in the wake of today's attacks. The American Red Cross Disaster Operations Center in Falls Church, Virginia is on national alert and is closely coordinating with federal, state and local agencies," the Red Cross said in a released statement. "The American Red Cross is ready to send over 50,000 units of blood into the affected areas as needed. Blood donors who have scheduled appointments are encouraged to make their donations, especially in the weeks ahead."

The Boston Medical Center Donation Center voice mailbox was full, and Massachusetts General Hospital announced that they would be accepting first 200 donations for the next few days and are asking people to come in next week.

"People are indeed stepping up," Berger said. "We saw 80 people Tuesday and we're on track to see 75 today. It's about six times more than normal. We are looking to schedule people for next week."

Meanwhile, President George W. Bush asked Congress for emergency funding and proclaimed that all flags on federal property and vessels will fly at half-staff.

"As a mark of respect for those killed by the heinous acts of violence perpetrated by faceless cowards upon the people and the freedom of the United States on Tuesday, I hereby order that the flag of the United States shall be flown at half-staff at the White House and upon all public buildings and grounds," the President continued, "all military posts and naval stations, and on all naval vessels of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia and throughout the United States and its Territories and possessions until sunset, Sunday, September 16, 2001."

The Secretary of State Colin Powell met with reporters and updated them yesterday afternoon.

A special note from the Collegian

For two days now, our country has been reeling in the shock of a terrible tragedy. While the perpetrators of the terrorist attacks have yet to be identified, fingers are being pointed. So far, many people are blaming already established terrorist groups such as the one headed by Osama Bin Laden. However, the United States Central Intelligence Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and several other agencies are working diligently to find the person or people responsible for the hijacking, and it is not known yet who the culprit is.

Many voices across the country can be heard demanding vengeance and retaliation of some sort. A frightening number of those voices are even clamoring for a full-scale war. Some think that going after a certain country or nation and killing people isn't the moral thing to do, and that doing so transforms the U.S. into a terrorist as well.

Nobody can say yet what our nation's response will be. Those decisions will be made by our leaders and security experts. It is the responsibility of our elected officials to decide what the next move will be. It is the responsibility of the country as a whole, though, to unite; in support, in compassion and in patience.

Now is not the time to make rash and misguided actions. Now is not the time to let differences of opinion divide our country or our campus. We must not blame one another. We must not attack one another for our colors, our families, our religions or our beliefs. We must come together as a community to support one another.

We must have faith in our leaders and our rescue teams, our medical personnel, our firefighters, our police officers and our construction workers. We must have faith in those who risked their lives to put out fires and help the victims. We must have faith that the guilty party will be discovered and that eventually, appropriate and just measures will be taken to find justice for this unspeakable act.

For now, we all must be patient, prudent and compassionate. Please, respect your classmates and your neighbors. Don't jump to judgment and act out feelings of frustration or aggression. Please remember that this is hard for everyone. This is a tragedy in America, but one that we will get through together.

SGA, administration reach out, help offered to grieving students

Freedom, well-being and where we at the University of Massachusetts go from here were among the topics discussed last night in an open discussion at the Blue Wall Cafe in the Campus Center.

"One thing to keep in mind is that freedom comes with an expense and we need to be willing to put up with individuals different opinions even though it may be painful," Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Javier Cevallos said. "However, our first concern right now is the safety of our students as well as protecting the rights of every student at UMass, and it's our role as a University to do so."

SGA President John Sheehan expressed his thoughts on the issue of violence on campus by explaining that he did not see it as an issue.

"I've spoken with a few organizations who may be subject to hostility and they have made it blatantly apparent that they are shocked and saddened by the tragic events," Sheehan said. "In times such as these we all look for someone to blame, but we need to step outside ourselves and realize that students here are so disconnected from what fostered these events and it makes no sense for anyone to resort to any form of violence or hostility."

Ever since tragedy struck the United States early Tuesday morning, SGA representatives and UMass administrators have been working hand-in-hand to help the campus cope with the aftermath of the tragedy in New York. One of the main efforts has been to make support outlets available to students at the University of Massachusetts.

Mental Health staff members were available at the discussion to help students in need.

"It's been a trying and difficult time but we've been working not only with students on campus, but as well as with other departments on campus in order to ensure students have outlets [to help or be helped]" Director of Mental Health, Harry Rockland-Miller said. "I encourage students to reach out to friends and family members as well as take advantage of the research available to them throughout the campus."

Assistant Chancellor for University Advancements and Special Projects Elizabeth Dale worked closely with the SGA, Campus Center personnel and various sponsors within the University to make last night's event possible.

"We decided that after [Tuesday's] vigil and the general student response that it would be a good idea to give students a place to go," Dale said. "We felt the need to open up a place where students could go and connect with one another."

"In all my years of working with the SGA this is the most collaborated and most cooperative group I've seen," Dale said of the past week's efforts. "It's really reached out to us as an administration and made us want to step up to the plate and do everything that we can to help."

Members of the SGA have been working closely with University administrators on future events as well as services to be made available for students.

Some programs in the beginning stages are a blood drive, which would take place this upcoming week as well as a prospective discounted rate on Peter Pan bus lines.

"We are working with the Peter Pan bus line in an effort to get buses at a discounted rate, to send students home to their families if need be," said Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders.

President John Sheehan added that he just wants students to be able to get on a bus and go home and not worry about being unable to purchase a ticket.

"It's important for this campus to come together and we need to look at the big picture and how it affects every student at the University," Sheehan said. "Right now it's about doing the little things and taking care of one another."

According to Saunders, one of the 'little things' is acquiring white ribbons to distribute to students as a sign of solidarity.

Student involvement has been a top priority on the minds of SGA members as they have been working closely with members of SCERA [Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy] to get students who want to help the opportunity to do so.

Interim SCERA Director Jess Cantelo said, "A lot of students just want to do something and people are feeling helpless, but want to help, so were here to help them as well as keep everyone connected during this time."

According to Dale, a memorial for those whose lives were lost and affected is also in the work.

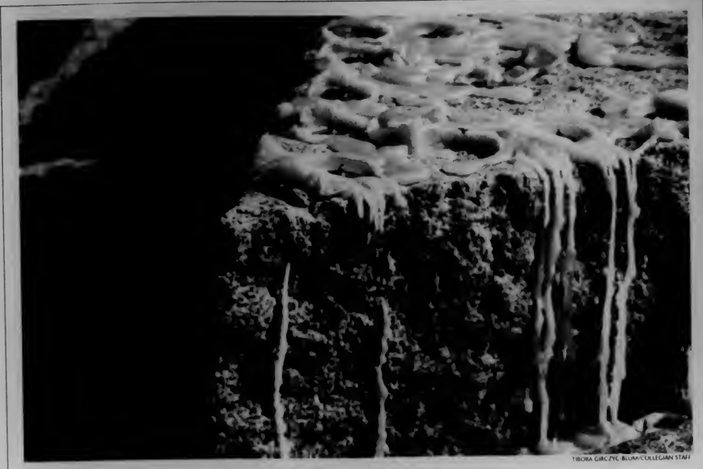
"Let me begin once again by saying that our hearts go out to all the victims and to their families. It is a tragedy, but as the President has made clear, it is a tragedy that we are strong enough to overcome," Secretary Powell said. "Our spirits will not be broken. The resilience of this society will not be broken. We will find out who is responsible for this and they will pay for it."

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfield held a briefing Tuesday night, and reiterated that the government is still functioning.

"The United States government is functioning in the face of this terrible act against our country," Rumsfield told reporters. "Make no mistake about it, your armed forces are ready."



The Air Force is mobilizing to aid in the relief effort at New York at Washington DC. Secretary of the Air Force James Roche contacted the Federal Emergency Management Agency immediately following the first reports of the attacks and offered maximum Air Force assets including personnel and equipment.

"The Air Force is mobilizing medical critical care units, aero medical evacuation teams, and critical incident stress management experts and other airlift assets in support of the president's activation of the National Disaster Medical System," an Air Force statement said. "Additionally, the Air Force is assisting with the distribution of blood supplies to the locations where they are most needed. Locations of the staging centers are not releasable at this time due to security concerns."

Senator John McCain (R-Arizona) delivered a speech on the Senate floor, condemning the attacks and calling for justice.

"We are greater than our enemies. We are greater because the very virtues our enemies revile and seek to destroy make us so," Senator McCain said. "These were not just crimes, they were acts of war, and have aroused in this great nation a controlled fury and unity of purpose not just to punish but vanquish . . . vanquish our enemies. Americans know now that we are at war, and will make the sacrifices and show the resolve necessary to prevail. I say to our enemies, we are coming. God may show you mercy. We will not."

America under attack:
a community responds

It is now two days since the horrible terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The events are no less shocking, no less painful, no less saddening.

If there is a ray of hope in all of this, some slight reason for confidence, it has been in the reaction of our people. On a national front, the rush for blood had been met in hours long lines of donors. Rescue workers from across the country have swarmed to New York City to assist in the effort. A country that just days before had so many reasons to be disparate has been given one horrible reason for unity.

On campus, there has been a tremendous out-pouring of support from faculty, staff and students. Tuesday's vigil was attended by upwards of 4,000 students, an unbelievable scene of units in the face of disaster. While the University didn't close yesterday, the official decision to allow for academic leniency all week was the best decision in a bad situation. If nothing else, that decision allows for students to deal with the horrible disasters in New York and Washington D.C. in any way that they see fit. Flexibility is always the best policy and Marcellette Williams showed maturity in handling the situation. Taking a pragmatic approach to the situation has helped everyone to keep a level head.

Faculty members have led students in discussions about what happened, trying to understand horrible events that occurred well outside their own areas of focus. And our Faculty members have shown pure emotion, moving outside the realm of academic tradition. This has clearly affected our professors as much as it has affected everyone else and their honesty has been refreshing and touching.

Our Student Government Association has risen to the task. Organizing Tuesday's vigil, collecting money for students and supporting students who are trying to affect the situation shows an amazing maturity from our elected student officials. Their apparent desire to lead when it would be far easier to grieve is overwhelming. Nobody has better represented the very sensitive needs of the University of Massachusetts student body better than the SGA.

At a time when a great tragedy could have shattered the slim bonds that hold us together, instead it seems as if we've grown closer. There is a commentary somewhere in the fact that it takes a disaster to bring people out of individual lives and to each other, but that is for a later time. While there are some in our community who would rush to immediate judgment about responsibility for these terrible attacks, the majority has remained restrained. Retaliation against possibly guilty parties has been almost nil, and while nothing would be ideal, the less the better.

In the meantime, there is only the continued shock and horror at what has happened so close to home. As one professor observed, this was the most heinous attack on our most known city; it isn't to right to compare this the Oklahoma City bombing, for it is all together, and in the end, perhaps all the more frightening. In that shock and horror, in the obscenity of the whole situation, there is the hope that we can all have after the bombing. It took a tragedy, but our communities and our nation have genuinely gelled.

MATTHEW DESPRES

"What a waste of human power, what a waste of human lives..."
- John Lennon

What a shame it is that we even have to discuss this.

The tragic events of Tuesday morning were a horrific misplacement and waste of human power, acts so inestimable that the number of lives lost may never fully register in our consciousness. The unthinkable had become real – not across the world, not only on our televisions, but in our own backyard. Places that, in one way or another, may have felt like – or have been – home.

The two days that have since passed have done nothing to alleviate the shock, to diminish our image of the World Trade Center being struck with innocent human lives, to dampen the cries of help from victims pouring forth from our televisions and radios.

Two days have done nothing to put a bearable space between us and the parents of victims appearing on TV, recounting their child's last moments.

Two days have done nothing to put things into perspective, and no amount of time may ever accomplish that.

My naïveté thought, initially at least, that it might. That, given some 48 hours to step back and acknowledge the larger picture, some nugget of truth would reveal itself; something that could be pointed out as, at the very least, a starting point.

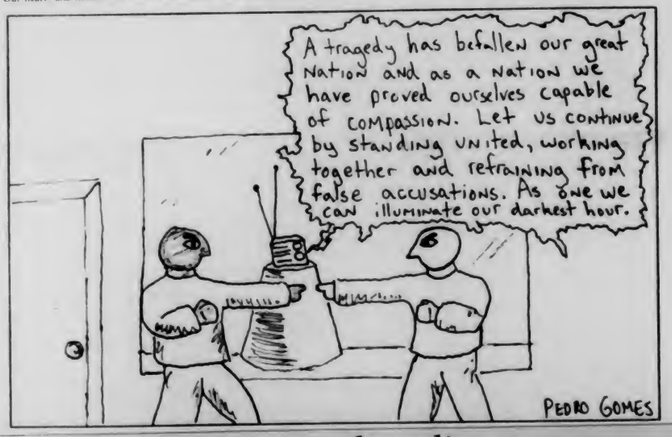
Instead, we've been drawn further into the fire, and our clouded view of what transpired has raised more questions than it could ever possibly begin to answer. Why did it happen? Who made it happen? Will it happen again...and where?

Our hearts and minds have been in a hundred different places for the past two days and, for awhile, I was trying to pull mine away from where it naturally wanted to go. I was trying to read and discuss something, anything, other than the attacks. Something other than the devastation, the flames, the individuals choosing one death over another by plunging from the towers.

No matter where we turn, though, or how fast we try to walk away, it catches up, turns the corner at the same time we choose to. I've turned away from my television countless times these past two days, only to be wrapped up in a discussion about what was unfolding where the towers once stood and the Pentagon remains. In turn, I've abandoned those conversations for other distractions, only to be met with the news in the unlikeliest of places. ESPN, MTV and other venues tailor-made to suit our taste for entertainment harbored the news too, as, I'm sure, was appropriate.

"There's no hiding the fact that I'm trying to run from this, trying to exercise an option that so many others have horribly and unfairly been denied. It scares me."

I turned from every media source I could and still ran headlong into it; in my thoughts, of my friends. The friend recently employed by the Navy, who remarked on the roadblocks near work, the half-hour wait to get off the base and the overwhelming sense of fear and confusion coursing through all personnel. The friend who had attended NYU and, had he stayed, would have been just moments away from the disaster. Who could have been in the heart of the disaster.



There's no hiding the fact that I'm trying to run from this, trying to exercise an option that so many others have horribly and unfairly been denied. It scares me. It kept me awake last night, and here I am, in Western Massachusetts, far enough away geographically that I should feel ok. Emotionally, though, it's nested deep inside each of us, and for those that were there, the individuals who both perished and survived, as well as immediate family and friends, there must be a feeling so powerful that no single word, phrase or motion could ever convey to the rest of us how badly it hurts.

How do we go about sorting this out? Is there a logical place to start, a point in the wake of this tragedy where things will begin to make sense? I understand the importance of political issues being raised – the finger pointing, the speculation, the plans to ensure this doesn't happen again – but I've pushed all of that away. For the majority of us, the regular citizens who can in reality only do so much, there's a much greater importance now in latching onto the emotional aspect of this, of firming our grasps on what we're fortune to have and wake up to.

I'll freely admit that when it comes to the technicalities of what's happened, the strains of relations with other countries and certain policies concerning our defense system, I'm quite illiterate, which has no doubt spurred my more emotional and instinctual take on this. For myself, and others in a similar state, it's more comforting to reach for the hands and comforts of friends and family than it is to sit and digest some political spiel rooted in the years past.

For those of you who have been directly impacted by the loss of a friend, family member or other close relation, words can't express enough the sympathy I feel each time I turn around and see another instance of how far this has reached. Chances are that we will all know of someone involved with one of the four flights taken down on Tuesday, and the grieving process will proceed, as life always does. It's my sincere hope that we take from this what we can; that we cast away party lines and other beliefs in favor of banding together and, somehow, getting through this as one.

Joining together in the wake of tragedy

MELISSA HAMMEL

I am a news writer. I tell the stories of people. I talk. I listen and I have opinions that cannot be expressed through my position. It doesn't allow me one. On Tuesday, however, the second day that will live in infamy in the American minds and hearts for ever, I had a strong one.

When I walked through the Campus Center after my second class had let out, I headed towards work. My first thoughts and instincts were to call my family and to go to a computer and write. I pushed my way through a sea of red-rimmed eyes and horrified faces. It just didn't seem real. When I first found out about the incident in class it was downplayed. Something had happened in New York. Students in my class said an airplane or a helicopter had struck a building. It was almost made out to sound like an accident; no one knew anything yet, no one had seen the vivid, shocking, clear photos of the World Trade Center collapsing into a cloud of smoke.

When I reached the miles of people standing in line at the pay phone I began to understand this was the real thing. There have always been moments when I have hated being a journalist and at the same time realized that this is why I do what I do.

How people respond to a tragedy is sometimes as telling as the catastrophe itself. New York City, a place falsely famous for its angry and unfriendly people, came out to take care of each other. Those physically unscathed by the tragedy lined up for hours in order to give blood to those in need. College students ran up to rescue workers in the streets asking if they could volunteer while people all over the country wished that they could do more. Especially telling was the numbers of people who continued to work and allow the United States to go on functioning.

Peter Jennings, perhaps the most famous broadcast journalist in the country, never left his ABC post, providing coverage to America for nearly two days following the calamity. His familiar face helped many to digest the tragic news, despite the fact that at times he was unsure if his wife, who was in New York City at the time of the incident, was alive or dead.

The firefighters, police and medical personnel responding in the hundreds volunteered their time and effort making themselves yet another set of heroes in the face of tragedy. Over 200 firefighters and police officers in New York City are missing and feared dead, many of whom perished not running away from the from the Trade Center, but instead running inside in order to save civilians. One firefighter refusing to take a break asked instead that the press contact his wife to tell her that he was still alive.

I can imagine that the President didn't really want to do his job two days ago either. Most likely he just wanted to see his wife and daughters and make sure that his family was all right. Unfortunately he did not have that luxury; instead, he was faced with the daunting task of making sense out of a tragedy and providing his country with some peace.

There were other heroes involved in this tragedy. Every person who offered someone else some comfort, a hug or even just a glass of water, those are the people that helped to alleviate suffering. Every person who donated blood or time or even money to the cause of helping others saved a life in some way. Everyone did what they knew how to do to make the situation better.

I did what I know how to do: write about the tragedy and try to get the information out to other people. I have to admit that I spent most of my night huddled near a television set watching a constant loop of video footage. The tiny figures throwing themselves out of windows to escape burning to death. Hearing the newscasters explain that others had stayed inside on cell phones, making their final farewells to family members, made me wonder how one would cope with a phone call like that. I clung to little bits and pieces of information on CNN.com, trying my best to comprehend what was going on and argued with friends about the best course of action for the US to take. I tried to make sense of something that seemed senseless.

I was unreasonable. I called my mother despite the fact that I knew that my entire family was living in Massachusetts. When I got the calming voice of my father on the answering machine I was unable to say a word. What was I going to say? I was so thankful that they were still there, alive and well, and at the same time so sorry for the people who could no longer call their parents.

In times of tragedy everyone gets together and does what they can to make things better by drawing on their special skills to do it. Firefighters and police officers saved lives, journalists reported, politicians tried to give us a sense of peace and the rest of us simply tried to make each other feel better.

Letters to the editor:
Interpreting a tragedy

To the editor:

In the aftermath of the Attack on America, Prof. Bill Israel has offered the Collegian's readers an interesting perspective on this terrible tragedy. In my apparent naiveté, I have always believed that any person who commits murder is responsible for his/her crime. Prof. Israel, however, assures us that the real villains in the carnage of September 11 are: the U.S. Supreme Court, George Bush, Ariel Sharon, and indirectly, Jeb Bush.

Perhaps this should come as no surprise given Prof. Israel's use of terminology related to the tragic struggle between Israel and the Palestinians. Most of us consider those who deliberately murder civilians in buses, discos and pizza parlors to be terrorists. To Prof. Israel, however, these individuals are simply "those who vigorously oppose" policies of Ariel Sharon. By analogy, the mass murder in the Twin Towers was simply an act committed by "those who vigorously oppose" aspects of U.S. foreign policy.

Prof. Israel refers to Germany, Japan, and World War II. Germany was upset about the Versailles Treaty, with some justification. Did that justify the attack on Poland and mass murders that followed? Japan was upset with U.S. opposition to its China policy, perhaps with some justification. But was there any justification for Pearl Harbor and the horrors committed against civilians in Asia?

To the editor:

When trying to piece together the many reasons why any group of individuals would masterminds such a calamity as the World Trade Center and Pentagon bombings, [it] requires one to think from the enemy's perspective.

Make no mistake. These terrorists are our enemies: politically and spiritually. Aside from damage to U.S. interests, there is no analogy to Pearl Harbor. On December 7, 1941, the Japanese Imperial Navy attacked and partially destroyed the U.S. Pacific Fleet. While there were civilian casualties, this was predominately a military strike against military targets intended to cripple our nation's military capabilities.

What happened on Tuesday, while no less infamous, pales in comparison. This strike was intended to inflict maximum physical, psychological, and spiritual damage on innocent civilians – male, female, old, young, etc. It's timing, its intended targets, all calculated to a satanic "perfection" against non-combatants.

Just what precipitated someone, or something, half a world away to plan such a ghastly deed? Consider.

United States foreign policy, for a number of years now, has shifted away from that of a moral constitutional republic, a beacon of liberty, to that of a pragmatic, arrogant spokesman for multinational interests. And much has been withheld from the American people, thanks to the corporate-owned media participants.

At several United Nations conferences that were convened to assess the needs of developing nations, the U.S. vigorously opposed pushed agendas that emphasized "family planning" initiatives, with full access to abortion and other reproductive "services." In addition, many developing nations were told they were "backwards" when it came to women's and "gay" rights. Backwards by whose perspective?

In return for food and medicine, they were told, to paraphrase, that they "must enter the 21st century."

During the last administration, interest groups from socially-conservative organizations such as Focus on the Family, Concerned Women from America, and the U.S. Catholic Conference were denied a voice on U.S. delegations, despite the fact that at least half of America, myself included, is a socially-conservative on the aforementioned issues.

But due to the arrogance of the self-anointed elites in the post-Christian west, which dominate our media, our politics, our education and economic institutions, one perspective only is peddled as "gospel" – the left's. The right is demonized with all the familiar adjectives.

Now, contrast this with what I mentioned at the outset from a terrorist's perspective. Islam, one of the world's three monotheistic religions, has seen a fundamentalist resurgence these past 25 years. Like Judeo-Christian mores, Islam also has a code of transcendent, absolute values.

While I don't agree with much of Islam's view on the role of women in society, I can see how a people who believe in an absolute system of right and wrong would be enraged at someone who arbitrarily tells them that a family is not necessarily defined as a husband, wife, and children. That a woman must work and be totally self-reliant in order to be a fulfilled woman, regardless of whether or not she chooses to work outside her home. Or that two men or women walking hand-in-hand, having children through unnatural means is good and decent. Or that darter snails and owls are more important than humans. Or that people who take their faith seriously and practice it are idiots and buffoons.

When you see this through the eyes of a would-be terrorist who uses this "difference of opinion" to foment hatred, it's easy for suicide bombers who are merely pawns to sincerely believe that they are in a holy war to liberate humanity from the "great Satan".

This atrocity was coming for many years. I believe the full strength of our military muscle must be used to extinguish this tyranny from the earth.

Just know we've created the monster these past 50-plus years.

Marky Mark and Rock Star: screaming for substance

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Correspondent

ROCK STAR
Directed by Stephen Herek
Starring Mark Wahlberg, Jennifer Aniston, and Timothy Spall
Playing at Cinemark 12

At one point or another in their lives, everyone has dreamed of becoming a rock star, living the glamorous life of sex, drugs and (of course) rock 'n' roll. Rock Star, a comic drama loosely based on the true story of Judas Priest, plays on the fantasy of a fan who gets to front his favorite band.

The legendary story of Judas Priest is that when frontman Rob Halford departed from the band, Tim "Ripper" Owens — who sang lead in a Priest tribute band — got the call to replace him, thus fulfilling the dream that many a fan has held. In Rock Star, directed by Stephen Herek from a script by actor-turned-director John Stockwell (crazy/beautiful), the band is Steel Dragon, an '80s-era hair metal group in the process of evicting lead singer Bobby Beers (Jason Flemyng) over matters of sexual politics (he's gay). Meanwhile, Chris Cole (Mark Wahlberg) is ousted from tribute band Blood Pollution and replaced by a talentless rival. Chris wants to perform only note-for-note Dragon tunes, while his lead guitarist wants to explore and write original tunes. Chris and his manager/girlfriend Emily (Jennifer Aniston) are dejected, until Chris gets a fateful phone call. Kirk Cuddy (Dominic West), the lead guitarist and producer for Steel Dragon, has seen a video of Chris performing and wants him to join the band.

Rock Star is a slicker, slighter, hard rock version of last year's best film, Cameron Crowe's exuberant poignant coming-of-age rock drama Almost Famous. You could call this Almost Famous Lite. Both films are about relative innocents and music fan that go on tour with the band. Both are steeped in reality (Crowe's film was autobiographical). Both mix drama with a comic view of the music industry. Only one has a depth of human feeling, and it isn't the one with big hair and tight leather pants.

Herek's previous credits (The Mighty Ducks, Mr. Holland's Opus, Holy Man) don't exactly scream rock realism, and this film only wades in the shallow end of the pool. The satirical details are by turns limp and easy. Jokes about bottle-blond bimbos throwing themselves at Chris are like shooting fish in a barrel, and casting real life rockers like Stephan Jenkins (Third Eye Blind), Brian Vander Ark (The Verve Pipe), Zakk Wylde (former guitarist for Ozzy Osbourne) and Jeff Pilson (Dokken) doesn't help. The guests are used more like props. Herek does show some visual style, at least in the music scenes; the movie grows stagnant when it switches over to the heartfelt sequences between Chris and Emily.

I don't pretend to be a fan of metal, but at least real bands like AC/DC and Def Leppard had more personality than the original tunes composed for this. The songs here — especially the clanker "Stand Up and Shout," heard about three times — are lifeless and generic, taking a backseat to the far more tuneful soundtrack of real '80s rockers. Steel Dragon seems less like a mega-selling innovator, than one of the derivative, forgettable cash-in bands that have one hit than fade into obscurity (think Ratt and Winger).

Wahlberg is more appealing here than he was as the fatally bland hero of Tim Burton's dull Planet of the Apes, though his performance doesn't equal those he gave in Boogie Nights and Three Kings. Aniston, too, is likable, but it's a nothing role: a cardboard cutout of a character. Rock Star would like to measure up to the great mockumentary This Is Spinal Tap, but it isn't content to savage rock excess; it wants us to feel for the plights of Chris and Emily as they descend into this underworld. Too bad the movie is too slickly predictable to move us or allow the laughs to cut deep (as one unlikely scene, Chris makes himself over as a grunge singer while Emily apparently invents Starbucks). Television world stalls in the wake of recent disaster; mourns the talent lost

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

After the tragic events of Tuesday, it will likely be sometime before things are business as usual in the U.S. The same goes for the television industry that has had, and will continue to have, its schedule altered due to the recent terrorist attacks.

Most Americans were glued to their television sets throughout Tuesday and into Wednesday with the constant barrage of news updates taking over the airwaves. All of the major networks and cable channels preempted their regular programming on Tuesday to provide commercial free coverage of the unfolding events. Even cable channels without their own news staff managed to carry live coverage on their channels due to tie-ins with broadcast networks. Because of this, the nation actually got to see the unlikely face of Dan Rather rather than Carson Daly on MTV (and BET for that matter), which are both owned by CBS parent company Viacom.

So which shows will be affected by the events of Tuesday? Here's a partial list:

The Emmy Awards, originally scheduled for this Sunday have been postponed with no make up date announced.

CBS cancelled the Latin Grammy Awards, and preempted Big Brother 2 on Tuesday, although Thursday night's finale was still on as of press time.

NFL games scheduled for this weekend have a strong possibility of being cancelled.

The WWF cancelled the tapings (usually held on Tuesday) for their Thursday Night UPN show "WWF Smackdown!" in Houston, Texas. Most likely the show will air live instead of on tape in its normal time slot.

Although there has been no comment yet from the Fox Network, the October 30th premiere of their new show "24" could also be in jeopardy. The series premiere features a terrorist bombing of a commercial airplane. Due to the unique format of the show in which each of the 24 episodes represent 24 hours of the one day that a bombing takes place, the entire series may have to be scrapped, or at least put on hold, since the show's storyline centers so heavily around an act of terrorism.

This wouldn't be the first time a television show was put on hold due to it being in questionable taste to air in light of current events. An episode of "Buffy The Vampire Slayer" featuring a school shooting was yanked in light of the 1999 Columbine High School shootings. The previous attack on The World Trade Center in 1993 led to an episode of "Melrose Place" that depicted a bombing being pulled from the schedule as well. When and if at all it is appropriate to air television that so closely resembles a real life tragedy will always be a both contented topic, and rightfully so.

Beyond the miniscule effects of a few television shows not airing in their usual timeslots, a few members of the television community tragically were victims of Tuesday's terrorist attacks.

David Angell, the Emmy award winning Executive producer of the NBC program "Frasier" was among the passengers on one of the hijacked planes that departed from Boston. He was travelling with his family back to California after a vacation on Cape Cod. Previous to his work on "Frasier," Angell had received an Emmy Award for his work as a writer for "Cheers." In between his work on "Cheers" and "Frasier," Angell served as the Executive producer for another NBC hit show, "Wings."

CNN Commentator Barbara Olsen was a passenger on American Airlines Flight 77, which crashed into the Pentagon. Olsen had originally been scheduled to fly on Monday, but postponed her flight until Tuesday, to spend the day with her husband on his birthday. Olsen gained notoriety as a former federal prosecutor who served on the Chief Investigative Counsel to the House Committee during its investigation into President Clinton's "Travelgate" scandal. She had been appearing as a conservative political commentator on CNN for several months.

Bring back the old Carpenter

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

GHOSTS OF MARS
Directed by John Carpenter
Starring Ice Cube, Natascha Henstridge, Jason Statham, Joanna Cassidy, and Pam Grier
Thankfully no longer playing in the area

In 2176, on a newly colonized Mars, a train pulls up to the station in the governing city of Chryse. There is no crew and only one passenger — Officer Melanie Ballard (emotionless Natascha Henstridge), who's found sleeping, handcuffed to a bunk. She's brought before a matriarchal council to tell what happened on a supposedly routine mission. And so begins John Carpenter's Ghosts of Mars an amped-up, dumbed-down variation on Night of The Living Dead as well as the director's own Assault on Precinct 13.

The routine mission is a prisoner transfer. Ballard is part of a crew, led by Helena Braddock (a bored looking Pam Grier), assigned to retrieve famed, wanted felon "Desolation" Williams (surly Ice Cube) from the mining outpost of Shining Canyon. However, when they get there, the interplanetary cops discover that the town is empty — except for the jailed prisoners and the headless bodies hanging in other locations. One of the prisoners is really a scientist (Joanna Cassidy) who explains what is happening. An archaeological excavation nearby has unleashed a sinister red dust (a virus? Ghosts?) that is the planet's defense against invaders. It will possess many of those it comes in contact with, causing them to fill their teeth, pierce their bodies and become mindless barbarians. Those not possessed will be attacked and decapitated. Not long after arriving, the cops and prisoners must team up to rumble with the violent possessed, who are led by a Marilyn Manson look alike.

Heads are lopped off, things explode, the heroes gun down bad guys. There's a macho good guy cop (Jason Statham) who hits on Ballard, who retorts with some witless banter. There's plenty of gore and forgettable dialogue. What the movie lacks are scares, exciting action sequences, and interesting characters.

What has happened to Carpenter? One-one of the foremost genre filmmakers, he created classics in the horror and sci-fi fields, films like the great Halloween and the violently imaginative Escape From L.A. He's a master at creating suspense, as any man who could single-handedly create a genre (the slasher film) would be. But, with the exception of In the Mouth of Madness (1995), he hasn't made a good film in years. The film looks good with its grungy, industrial sets, and the music — composed by Carpenter himself — keeps the movie cranking. Yet the movie has precious little tension, replacing it with mayhem and gore. After the laughable Mission To Mars and dull Red Planet, Carth's neighbor once again finds it's reputation sullied. Here's hoping a talented filmmaker will regain his footing and make a new film that blasts off, rather than crashes into the ground.

Due to the cancellation of Tuesday's Collegian meeting, a rescheduling is in the works for the near future. In the meantime, anyone interested in contributing to Arts can visit Julie, Shauna, or Mike at the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement.

Stereolab scores one cool-ass elevator

By Serge Pinsky
Collegian Correspondent

STEREOLAB
Sound-Dust
Matador

The Brit-Aussi-French art-pop band Stereolab has been a sort of sonic anomaly for the past decade, making one strange album after another, and often receiving critical praise for their efforts. They have achieved a small but faithful cult following in the U.K. but haven't made much of a splash here in the States, despite releasing a few singles that have played on college radio. One can see how easily Stereolab could have been missed by the pop radar, especially since they formed when grunge was huge here and their sound differs so greatly from your average stone temple pilot.

Their mid-'90's album Transient Random-Noise Bursts with Announcements explains their sound quite well, but listening to their latest work, Sound-Dust, I get the distinct impression that they've grown, musically and lyrically. Sound-Dust is a lushly produced, experimental lounge-pop album that sounds like nothing I've ever heard before.

For one, it incorporates horn arrangements that sound like they belong on some old Burt Bacharach record. Half the album sounds like elevator muzak (but I'm not talking about some Southwest tower elevator here—this would have to be the coolest elevator ever invented, one with a guy in a hat that has to open the elevator door manually...but I digress). A few of Sound-Dust's tracks go through several musical changes, where halfway into a certain song, the band stops and starts a totally different sounding song without moving on to the next track. This works well on the appropriately titled single, "Captain EasyChord" but not at all on the track "Space Moth," where one melody doesn't flow into the next one at all, making the mood/music change sound clumsy. A strange feeling of nostalgia also creeps over the album. Listening to Sound-Dust, you get the feeling that Stereolab wishes they existed in the 60s, when music like this was hip and people were doing enough drugs to get the point.

And then there are the vocals—did I mention that they are mostly in French? Singer/keyboardist Mary Hansen's mellow voice adds a lot of atmosphere to the music, especially on tracks like the experimentally weird opener "Black Ants in Sound-Dust," on which her voice is used in very Radiohead-Kid A fashion as a remixed background instrument in itself. Most of the time, Hansen's voice is heard singing a sweet harmony with the repetitive and yet catchy synthesizer/piano-led melody that Stereolab creates in each of its songs.

Stereolab's lyrics might be the most fascinating thing about the band. On past albums, Stereolab had many songs that supported Marxist and other revolutionary ideologies, but they've trimmed those political statements for this latest album. Only one track ("Gus the Mynah Bird") mentions a "military regime in a democratic disguise." This album seems much lighter and less concerned with changing the world and more with finding some inner peace. This will no doubt upset long-time Stereolab fans that take the political edge of the band very seriously.

Stereolab's Sound-Dust is clearly not for everyone. But in this shitty corporate bubblegum pop and rap-metal music world, one needs something fresh and unique. Stereolab is undeniably both. I don't know if you will bother to give this band a try but the next time that I get sick of the radio (which happened about 3 years ago), you can be sure that a Stereolab CD will be found in my stereo.

The NFC: It's an all-out sprint

National Football Conference

East Division

The Giants took the east last year by dominating within the division. They haven't lost to the Eagles in eight straight games. But Donovan McNabb is a year older and by draft, trade and free agency he finally has guys to throw to that aren't Chad Lewis. Philly looks like a team destined to greatness but until they beat the Giants and erase the ghosts of last years postseason, destiny means squat.

New York Giants

Central Division

The Bucs finally have a quarterback who can pump fake without dropping the ball. Maybe then he will realize that the only way to score in Tampa Bay is by throwing to the "Key" to the offense. It would also help to use Warrick Dunn a little bit too. The Bucs will not win running away, as Breet Favre and the resurgent Pack are ready to rumble in the Norris. Then there's those Vikes, they can score.

Tampa Bay Buccaneers

■ pros

The New York Jets have already expressed their concern for traveling this weekend, and believe the NFL should postpone this weekend's fifteen games.

"I don't understand why we're here today," Jets quarterback Vinny Testaverde said. "I think all the games should be cancelled this week."

"The last thing we want to do is get on a plane and go to California for a game when all four of those planes that were hijacked were going to California," he added.

Most of this weekend's college football games will be played, as the decision of whether to postpone the contests was left to the commissioners of the 10 Division I-A conferences and their members. The Big East, Pac-10, and ACC decided to postpone their games. However, this weekend's highly anticipated SEC match-up between No. 8 Tennessee and No. 2 Florida will be played in Gainesville, FL as scheduled.

Members of both the United States and European Ryder Cup golf teams have called for the postponement of the event, scheduled for September 28-30 at The Belfry in England.

"We are due to fly out on Sunday next week to England, and my guess is that is too soon after this tragedy," said U.S. member Mark Calcavecchia, winner of this year's British Open. "I think you can forget about the Ryder Cup for a few months, at least."

More tragedy struck the sports world as well on Wednesday when it was announced that Mari-Rae Sopper, women's gymnastics coach at the University of California-Santa Barbara, was on the American Airlines flight that crashed into the Pentagon. This follows the announcement of the death of two Los Angeles Kings scouts who were on one of the flights that crashed into the World Trade Center.

season).

"We were trying to make it a festive atmosphere so a lot of fans would come and support the team," Whipple said. "We wanted to make it a special game for the seniors."

Since McGuirk Alumni Stadium does not have built in lights, the fixtures were supposed to be transported in for the match up – but those lights are presently in New York City helping with the relief effort.

As thousands of Americans rally to the cry of "we must go on," much of the sports world has come to a halt. There is truth in the belief that continuing to live will combat the images of death. But there is chivalry in the notion of stopping to ponder the importance of a tragedy and arresting one's daily routine to honor the lives of those who have perished.

Horoscopes

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Your tactics may be rather unconventional, but you're likely to find winning results no matter how unusual your approach may be. Go down the path less followed, either way you're screwed!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Are you intruding on someone else's private time? Be sure you're not actually pushing this person away in your attempte to get a little closer. So leave the room when you're roommate is getting it on, unless that's your deal.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – It's time to "let go" a little in order to increase the chances of winning big when the time comes. Don't be so safe and "responsible" today. Be bad, just like Wita Ford.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – It's time to put your words in to action today. Concentrate on fulfilling your potential – and improving your image among those who count. You're going to meet some hot guy and get it on on the 18th floor of the library.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Don't stir up the dirt around your feet today; emotional issues that have been lying dormant needn't be reintroduced at this time. Maybe if you keep your mouth shut this one time, it will work out.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – This is a good day to take advantage of the personal knowledge you've gained in the course of your work. Treat others with care and sympathy. Buy your friends ice cream, with sprinkles on top.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You may have to prove something to others today that you've been sure of for some time. Still, it's important that you promote yourself now. This may be the best time to tell your roommate you're afraid of the dark.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You're in no mood to be tied on a wild-goose-chase today. What you're after is something far more and real and far more tangible; go get it, or don't. Stay in your room and keep playing video games.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Even the little things have the power to change your life in ways you hadn't imagined. Of course you didn't imagine them, you have no imagination. Maybe if your parents didn't use the TV as a babysitter all those years you would have grown to think for yourself.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Let someone else go first today and you'll know what you're getting into. When the time comes, you'll be ready to take a full part in it. Snoogins!

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Your sense of humor is likely to save the day today – especially after dark, when people start saying things that are easily misunderstood, mainly because they are drunk.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Your sparkling traits can be shown off to great advantage today – provided you can anticipate the onset of depression and avoid it all together. Make sure you wear your skinny pants.

No UMass athletic events will be played this weekend. That means McGuirk Stadium will not see any light on Saturday evening.

Football, other UMass athletics halted by national tragedy

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts football coach Mark Whipple has grown accustomed to being in charge, but yesterday afternoon, he was the one asking the questions.

Addressing alumni at the weekly Sports Luncheon, the UMass skipper stood behind the podium with a baffled expression and an inquiring tone. Instead of hearing answers, he could only offer a bevy of doubts to the sparse audience.

"I really have no idea what is going on," Whipple said about the pending NCAA decision on whether to play Saturday's college football games after the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C.

Whipple expressed his frustration with the NCAA's decision-making, or lack there of.

"The administration has made it hard to play this weekend," he said.

But instead of waiting for college sports' governing body to mull over the issue, UMass Athletic Director Bob Marcum took matters into his own hands.

"After consulting with people on our campus and at Richmond, we have decided to postpone Saturday's game," Marcum said.

The UMass A.D. made the decision at around five o'clock yesterday afternoon, but prior to that point, Whipple and his team were left completely in the dark.

"I am their leader," Whipple said. "They are looking to me for answers and I don't know what to tell them. They are literally scared to death."

With 24 of his players from the tri-state area alone (NY-NJ-CT), the trivial pursuit of victory on the gridiron has taken a way-back seat to the maintenance of life.

"I had half my kids outside the locker room on cell phones trying to make sure there loved ones are O.K.," Whipple said. "What happens if one of my guys gets that phone call while we are out on the field. What then?"

It can't be easy to mentally prepare forty 18 to 21 year-olds for battle on the field when every ounce of cerebral strength has been completely drained already. Not to mention the fact that starting game preparations mid-week is no simple task.

"It's hard to just turn around and prepare for a football game," Whipple said.

Saturday's match up would have been the biggest game of the season for the Minutemen as UMass (0-2) was scheduled to play Richmond, which currently stands at a very deceiving 0-1 (the loss is to I-A Virginia 17-16).

"Richmond is the best team in our league," Whipple said. "I said that coming into the season."

With the importance of the contest in mind, Whipple and Marcum had scheduled it as a night game (the only designated home night game of the

Pros standing still

By Andy Vogt

Sporting events across the United States again took a back seat yesterday to more important matters as the nation continues to recover from Tuesday's devastating terrorist attacks.

Major League Baseball postponed all of yesterday's and today's contests on Wednesday. No make-up dates have been announced at this time, and it is unknown whether the games will be played at all. However, ESPN's Peter Gammons reported yesterday that baseball's plan is to resume play on Friday, and reschedule the postponed contests after the end of the regular season.

MLB Commissioner Bud Selig gave no confirmation of this report, saying "I think many people would hope we'd start Friday, but I haven't made that judgment yet."

Many players across baseball supported the league's decision to Jones of the Atlanta Braves temporarily postpone its contests. Casey Fossum of the Boston Red Sox told the Boston Herald "there's no reason we should be playing after all of this tragedy," saying "baseball should be the last thing on our minds."

"It's very petty to even think about playing a baseball game at this point," said Chipper Jones of the Atlanta Braves. "I think everybody is focused on [this] and not on something as unimportant as a few September baseball games."

The postponement of these games has temporarily halted several exciting pennant races and other developing stories as the season winds down. Barry Bonds remains at 63 home runs as he and his San Francisco Giants teammates wait in Houston to resume play against the Astros. The Giants are also in a tight NL West race with the Arizona Diamondbacks, and are at the top of a complicated wild card race with St. Louis, Chicago, and Los Angeles.

The status of this weekend's National Football League games also remains uncertain at this time. A decision is expected to be made as to whether or not to cancel Sunday and Monday's games after the league's 9:30 A.M. conference call this morning.

"We are continuing to assess the situation and discuss it with many people, both inside and outside the NFL," said the league in a statement released Wednesday afternoon.

UMass professors aid Russian schools

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts group assisted the faculty of three Russian universities to address the demands of development and environmental protection in northwest Russia during a two-week visit last June.

The project entitled "Curriculum and Materials Development in Land and Property Management Systems" is the latest in an eight-year series of exchanges between UMass faculty and northwest Russian universities. Started in 1999, the project focuses on the development of new courses and teaching materials on land and property management, sustainable development, land use, and the privatization of land.

The project, led by Richard P. Taupier of the Environmental Institute and Meir Gross, a Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning (LARP) professor, also included six additional UMass faculty members and one graduate student. The team traveled to the Pskov Center for Regional Planning, the Yaroslav-the-Wise Novgorod State University and the St. Petersberg State Technical University.

Local students attended the courses offered by UMass faculty as a complement to courses in which they were already enrolled. The faculty lectured through student translators and administered an exam at the end of the two weeks.

Craig Moore of the Isenberg School of Management and Maureen Lempke, an adjunct professor in LARP taught courses at Pskov. Joseph Larson, professor emeritus, and Natural Resources Conservation Professor Robert Muth consulted and taught at Yaroslav-the-Wise Novgorod State University as well as the Rdeysky State Nature Reserve. Hotel, Restaurant and Travel Administration Professor Robert Wilson and Ben Branch of the Isenberg School of Management taught and worked at St. Petersburg. Taupier, Gross and graduate student Gerald Rideout served as project coordinators for all the institutions.

Taupier and Gross have been involved in these exchanges since the projects began in 1994. Taupier, having traveled to Russia some 18 times himself, notes that they like to find new people for the project. Of this year's group, Rideout had lived in Russia for a year, four faculty members participated in last year's project, and the remaining two were first-time participants.

The ancient fortress of Izborsk near Pskov, Russia. University of Massachusetts professors will teach near there next year.

Through the consulting, coordinating and teaching, Taupier upholds that "the reality of the situation is we always learn a lot more than we teach." He emphasizes that all participants learn a lot about Russian culture, people, and the methods used at the various universities.

While many of the professors teach courses similar to those taught at UMass, Taupier warns against using the same material in Russia.

"You can't presume that the way we do things in the United States is going to work in Russia and if you make that presumption, you may not do anything useful while you're there," Taupier said.

Forum on terrorism focuses on options

By Jessica May
Collegian Staff

Two days after the World Trade Center and the Pentagon exploded into fiery debris at the hands of hijackers, the University of Massachusetts-Amherst faculty and students met to discuss the events and the political ramifications of terrorism.

The act carried out on the World Trade Center "was probably carried out by Arab or Muslim countries associated with Bin Laden," announced Legal Studies professor David Mednicoff at the forum held yesterday afternoon in Thompson Hall.

Mednicoff has lived and worked in Morocco, Egypt, Algeria, Tunisia, and Israel.

"[This forum] is a time for us to come together as a group who work on those things, politics and policies," said John Brigham, political science professor and mediator of the forum.

Political Science professor Srirupa Roy expressed her personal "sense of profound shock and horror" on Tuesday's events.

Brigham was "struck by the eagerness to call (the event) an act of war" and is "pleased the government is treating it partially as a crime." He also expressed that "the government is proceeding to make it seem unlike Pearl Harbor."

However, Mednicoff stipulated that military action is in the works and there isn't any kind of action the United States can take that will work.

"Even a successful strike isn't going to stop terrorism and its preconditions," evaluated Mednicoff. He also expressed his belief in terrorists not being irrational or insane, but doing such an act to gain adherence and sympathizers.

Roy admitted she was not sure how terrorism gets defined, however she did say that "we don't know what terrorism is until after the act.

There is a horrible, slippery quality to the term."

"In the long run, all security efforts won't work unless we find out why terrorism struck," said Political Science Chairman Eric Einhorn.

New York University Political Science and Law professor Christine Harrington noted that this is "the first time in a long time the New York Times has referred to the President as a minority president."

Roy stated that the World Trade Center towers were "symbolically New York and that skyline has an affect that is global."

Geosciences professor Rod Platt was present at yesterday's forum and commented on his belief that this is the end of the era of skyscrapers as an office. This event will allow the "decentralization of corporate headquarters for companies."

Mednicoff spoke of the television media, stressing the importance for Americans to resume business as usual. This viewpoint was not shared by all. Some felt that America would never be quite the same.

"We cannot return to normality," Legal Studies sophomore Gary Menin said. "But (we can) return to a new normality."

Political Science professor Peter Haas said, "People of terrorism are willing to sacrifice their lives."

Mednicoff stressed how happy and impressed he was with the community response and "to go out of your way to be supportive and show empathy for Muslims and Arabs in the community."

Dining services serves up comfort

By Martha Robbins
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts community has been reaching out in several ways to help comfort the grieving and concerned.

Director of Dining and Retail Food Services Ken Toong received a telephone call from the Student Government Association just after the attacks, requesting help in a gesture to give free food or drinks to students in order to "warm their hearts".

Toong, along with SGA President John Sheehan and Student Trustee John Laubinger headed out to the Student Union and to the Bluewall to comfort students. They gave away free bottles of water in order to console students as they digested the news of the attacks. That is not all that the SGA, as well as UMass Dining Services, have done in order to relieve students and co-workers of grief and sorrow during this tragedy.

Toong and dining commons managers let their student employees leave their jobs early if they could not work, or if they wanted to go to the candlelight vigil Tuesday night. Toong and other dining common employees worked with the SGA at the vigil as well to give out free coffee, donuts and water to the thousands of students that attended.

"I think we need to reach out to make students feel safe," Toong said. In addition to accommodating his student employees and reaching out to students on campus, Toong, along with the SGA, the UMass Alumni Association and the UMass Amherst campus, held "A Gathering of Friends" last night in the Bluewall Cafeteria. The event promised free food and drinks, and counseling staff available for discussion and help.

"I hope it's over; I hope we can find out who is responsible for this," Toong said. "I always feel sorrow for people who have lost loved ones."

Assistant manager of Hampshire Dining Commons and Hampden Athletic, Elizabeth Marcil noted that students' body language suggested a reaction to yesterday's tragedy. Marcil and Toong have been accommodating the student body flow into and out of the dining commons.

"Sometimes food is a universal language," Toong said, adding the dining commons employees and staff are doing "anything we can do to calm the students and make them feel at home.

"We like to meet their needs."

Dining Services employees extend their sorrow, prayers and thoughts to the victims and survivors, as well as friends and family of anybody directly involved in the attacks.

Dottie Allen, a Worcester Dining Commons employee, feels concern for the University's New York City residents.

"It's just a crazy world," Allen said. Allen, along with other Dining Commons employees on campus, has been trying to accommodate students and co-workers appropriately during this tragedy.

Local relief efforts

The American Red Cross will be holding a blood drive on the University of Massachusetts-Amherst campus on Monday, Sept. 17 from 10:30 a.m. until 4:30 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

"Due to the tragic events that have occurred in the past week, the need for blood is greater than it has ever been," the New England regional office of the American Red Cross said in a released statement. "The American Red Cross has received an overwhelming response from the public and the students of UMass will have the opportunity to help out."

All donors must be 17 years of age or older, weigh at least 110 pounds and be in general good health. Donations will be taken on a walk-in basis.

"These blood donations will be used to help the victims of last week's tragedy, as well as those patients in New England who are in need of blood," the Red Cross stated. "Students should be reminded that the need for blood is never-ending and that the blood that is used today will be just as needed down the road." The Red Cross was scheduled to be on campus again on Tuesday; however, due to "staffing issues," that drive has been cancelled.

Other local relief efforts include a car wash by the brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon and the sisters of Sigma Delta Tau at Rafters Bar and Grill on the corner of University Drive and Amity Street in Amherst this Sunday, Sept. 16 from 9:00 a.m. to 12:30 p.m.

Cars will be washed for five dollars, and all proceeds will be donated to the American Red Cross. Other donations will also be accepted.

Fulbright honors prof

By Jessica Pollack
Collegian Correspondent

Stephen J. Simurda, a Journalism faculty member, is one of the fortunate University of Massachusetts professors to have won a Fulbright Scholarship.

This fall, Simurda will be teaching journalism at two universities in Slovakia, formally a part of Czechoslovakia. He will be teaching a graduate course at the Academia Istropolitana Nova in Bratislava, and an undergraduate class at the University of Cyril and Methodus in Trnava. The students attending these schools come from eight different countries. They will take part in an intense program consisting of studies in radio, press, and television. Simurda will be concentrating on making these students knowledgeable on the ideals of a free press.

About a year ago, Simurda began his application process for the scholarship and filled out many government papers. Upon his arrival in Slovakia, he will be attending weekend orientations, where he will learn what is expected of his teachings in the classroom. He will be given the guidelines that professors need to abide by throughout their teaching semester.

Simurda has had a long-term interest with the many different changes taking place in European countries. In the 1980s he spent a great deal of time learning and writing about the economic changes taking place in this region.

"Now is the perfect opportunity to see how the emerging idea of a free press is working out in this region," Simurda said.

Simurda, who has a Slovak heritage, feels a strong connection with the country.

"I hope to gain much knowledge about the region, so I can come back with new research for academic specialists," Simurda said. "My main goal is to learn as much as I teach."

For many years, the Eastern European countries have had government-controlled press. Simurda now has the chance to teach these young journalists about a free press, as well as its inside workings. Although they are critical about the idea of a free press, Simurda feels that their skepticism is a good thing.

"Teaching these students will enable me to gain an enhanced understanding of the country, academic field, and language," Simurda said. "Not only will I be exposed to a new way of life, but also a new perspective on it."

The Fulbright program will expose Simurda to new teaching methods as well as new views on the world. Simurda is very interested in the diversity of ideas that exist within the changes in that area. He feels privileged to be able to contribute to a mutual understanding of the free press between the United States and the rest of the world.

A great benefit of this program for Simurda is that he will have the opportunity to live in another part of the world with his wife and two children. He wants his children to have the opportunity to see there is more to life than "Nintendo games and television."

One of the important objectives for Simurda is to "maintain ongoing contacts with people all over the world and be able to continue to learn from each other."

Anti- Muslim backlash feared at UCal - Berkeley

By Meghna Subramanian, Nathaniel Malcolm & Eric Ostrem
Daily Californian (U. California – Berkeley)

(U-WIRE) BERKELEY, Calif. – Some local Muslims and Arab-Americans on campus and in the Bay Area found themselves confronted with harassment and threats in the aftermath of Tuesday's attacks.

The president of University of California-Berkeley's Muslim Student Association said the group has received hate e-mail. They have also heard reports from Muslim and Arab-American students who have received insulting hand gestures while driving.

The student group has set up a series of safety precautions, but hopes all students will remain "cool, calm and collected."

"I think a lot of people are forgetting we're Americans, too. This affects us, too," said Basim Elkarra, president of the UC Berkeley division of the association. "We're taking every precaution."

The association is taking safety measures to protect threatened students, including implementing a car escort service and training people in how to deal with verbal harassment.

While Elkarra was speaking to a reporter Wednesday night, he received a phone call from a Muslim female student who was scared to walk home alone. He dispatched a car from the association's escort service to drive her home.

There have been reports of anti-Arab and anti-Muslim sentiment at the University of California-Los Angeles. A Muslim female student was reportedly assaulted because of her appearance, Elkarra said.

Organizers of the Arab Film Festival canceled Wednesday's event scheduled to take place in Berkeley, citing worries about security.

"We did have to take into account the security of the people who would attend. People start saying Arab and Muslim and, you know, most of our audience might not feel comfortable coming to the theater," said Halil Enkitano, the executive director and curator of the film festival.

"It was something we had to do," he said.

Karen Kenney, UC Berkeley dean of students, said various students have expressed worries about their safety. They related stories to her about Muslim women being harassed for wearing hijabs, the scarves some

New Smith College president takes over in July

By Elizabeth Hockstad
Collegian Correspondent

As Northampton's Smith College begins the school year with an ambitious fund-raising campaign and initiatives to develop its engineering program and science facilities, the coming year will bring another major change to the school: a new president.

The Smith Board of Trustees named Carol Tecla Christ the tenth President of the college on July 30. Christ was the unanimous choice of a 20-member search committee that included trustees, alumnae and students.

She will replace Ruth J. Simmons, who left this year to lead Brown University. John Connolly will continue as Acting President until Christ takes over in July 2002.

Christ, a scholar of Victorian literature who holds a Ph.D. from Yale, will finish the school year teaching full-time at the University of California-Berkeley, her higher-ed home since 1970. She served there as vice-chancellor and later executive vice-chancellor and provost from 1994 to 2000, making her the highest-ranking female administrator at the university.

Though Christ works from a liberal arts perspective, she was able to develop and strengthen the sciences at Berkeley, helping the university build top-ranking departments. She focused especially on involving women in the sciences, and in education in general.

"She is a very experienced administrator and she has dealt with some of the issues Smith has on its plate," says Mary Patterson McPherson, chair of the presidential search committee and former president of Bryn Mawr College.

A major issue Christ faced during her tenure at Berkeley was diversity. She was a spokesperson for affirmative action even after the state of California passed Proposition 209 in 1996, barring consideration of race in college admissions.

Christ is a graduate of a women's college herself, as she holds an undergraduate degree from Douglass College of Rutgers University. McPherson says Christ's outgoing and energetic personality made her a successful administrator and beloved teacher at Berkeley, and when she becomes a Smithie next July, the nation's largest undergraduate women's college will benefit from her leadership.

"She cares a lot about the academic enterprise," McPherson says. "She cares a lot about students. I think they'll like her."

BU student among lost

By Jessica Van Sack
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON - Confident, outgoing and sharp, Lisa Frost was ready to pick up and start anew in San Francisco, possibly to open her own magazine.

On Tuesday, however, she perished on United Airlines Flight 175 from Boston to Los Angeles, which crashed into the South Tower of the World Trade Center. Frost, the commencement speaker at this year's Boston University School of Hospitality graduation, was 22 and hailed from Rancho Santa Margarita, Calif.

Described by friends as extremely involved in school and a prominent face on campus, Frost was an orientation leader, a student interviewer for the Office of Undergraduate Admissions, and a peer advisor. She was the president of the SHA student government last year, an employee at the Boston College Club and is credited with starting the SHA honor society's involvement in community service.

Those who knew her said, above all, she was a good friend.

"She just would go out of her way to make you feel completely at ease and comfortable with her," said 2001 School of Management graduate Tim Moore. "She never seemed bored or upset or angry at all."

"She made it easy to like her," said former fellow student adviser Matthew Toomey, a 2001 graduate of the College of Communication.

Many of her student advisees and fellow student leaders expressed that Frost was ambitious and fearless, the type of person who balanced multiple tasks seemingly effortlessly.

"She was flying to California to start a new life with absolutely no fear on her part and the part of others that she could be successful. She did BUCOP and graduated from both the College of Communication and SHA. She could easily juggle 12 balls at one time without even being fazed. She was a totally, totally dynamic woman," said SHA junior Kiran Pinto, one of Frost's student advisees.

Her friends last saw her Monday when she stopped by SHA to say goodbye before her move to California, where her marketing job offered the opportunity to start another branch of a company food review magazine.

According to Frost's boss Jill Epstein, publisher of Where to Eat, Frost originally planned to fly to California three weeks ago, but opted to stay to get the next issue of the magazine to press.

"Daily we marveled at her organization skills, art of time management and dedication to us," Epstein said.

Pinto said Frost's friends are trying to organize a memorial for her. Frost's parents couldn't be reached last night.

"She was amazing," Moore said. "Lisa was just one of those people you will never forget in life."

Although the team has returned from Russia, its work is far from done. Taupier said they are currently working on finishing course descriptions, course outlines and getting a series of papers (authored by UMass and Russian faculty) published. The team has already developed eight new courses and is well into writing these papers that will eventually become four volumes printed in Russian and serve as textbooks for the Russian students.

Taupier and his team are also preparing for future exchanges. In November, six administrators from the three universities will come to UMass for a visit and may hold talks on education in Russia. Next June, Taupier will return to Russia with two new faculty members. As 2002 heralds the final year for the current project, Taupier will spend the winter working on new proposals such as a wetlands research center and a summer program on ecological tourism and park planning for both UMass and Russian students.

Past projects have led to many exchanges between UMass and Russian universities. Between 1995 and 1998, the projects attracted over 32 faculty members to teach or study at UMass in order to set up new courses and have access to new material for the home universities. The 2001-2002 academic year has also attracted a handful of Russian graduate students.

It was the 1995-1998 period that the University of Massachusetts/Pskov Partnership Project for Regional Development operated. Unlike the current project, it was limited to the Pskov region, where UMass faculty helped develop a new major at the Pskov Polytechnic Institute in Regional Planning. It is now the largest major on campus, comprising 20 percent of the student population. The June trip to Pskov included attending the graduation of the first class of Regional Planning majors.

The project was also charged with the duty of setting up an office of U.S.-Russian trade, and to establish the Center for Regional Planning (previously a part of the Pskov Polytechnic Institute), which allowed a group of students, faculty and professional staff of the polytechnic institute to work with the regional government. The Pskov Partnership Project was funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development and the current project by the U.S. State Department Bureau of Cultural and Educational Affairs.

UMass's presence in northwest Russia is going on its eighth year.

"It's certainly a labor of love; it doesn't pay very well," Taupier said. "I feel like we made some differences."

■ Muslim

Muslim women wear over their hair.

Kenney said the university is currently setting up a bias-related incident hotline for both students and faculty to call in to report violence or talk about safety measures on campus.

UC police Captain Bill Cooper said the department has received no reports of violence toward Arab or Muslim students, but the police are taking proactive measures to ensure violence does not occur.

Muslim and Arab groups nationwide are united in condemning the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon.

ASUC Senator Sajid Khan, member of the Muslim Students Association, urged students not to blame American Muslims or Arab Americans for the attack.

"We as students should try our best to not jump to conclusions and act on stereotypes," Khan said. "We are taught to be intelligent and make rational decisions. If it is a Muslim or Arab suspect that arises in the case, the (UC Berkeley) community should not judge Muslims based on certain individuals." Elkarra also said many people overlook the fact that there were many Muslim and Arab-Americans working in the World Trade Center at the time of the attack.

"We know the American public is in shock, but Muslim-Americans are in shock as well," Elkarra said.

UC Berkeley Chancellor Robert Berdahl warned Berkeleyans against making rash judgments.

"There is no reason for anyone to blame anyone other than the perpetrator of this – and our students are not perpetrators," Berdahl said Tuesday.

In an effort to increase awareness about Islam, members of UC Berkeley's Muslim Students Association have extended their tabling hours on Sproul.

In addition, on Friday from 1:15 to 2:30 p.m., the group is holding its Jummah, or Friday prayer, on campus, combining it with an information session. It is normally held at the YWCA, but this time it will be in Pauley Ballroom so all UC Berkeley students can attend.

Maha El Genaidi of the Islamic Networks Group said the media is wrongly associating Islam with the attacks. She said her organization had already received a total of ten threatening phone calls as of Wednesday afternoon.

"It scares me that stuff like that can happen," said Patrick Sullivan, a Worcester Dining Commons employee. "Hopefully it will give our government a chance to see that these sorts of things can happen on American soil."

As with any attack or tragic event, several questions are left unanswered for the time being. Survivors, victims, by-standers and witnesses are left with an overwhelming feeling of loss, helplessness and shock. For now, Toong explained we need "some quiet time to heal our wounds."

On September 14th 2:30 and 3:35 classes will be cancelled. Students are encouraged to gather at the Campus Pond for remembrance between 3 to 4pm.

Pulling together:

looking back on a tragic week

The events of this week have left this country and, more specifically, the local community, exhausted. Individuals from all over have been put to the test and asked to aid their country in any way they can. The rapid rate at which this story has unfolded has left little to time to digest it, to sit back and get a strong hold on what has actually happened and what it all means. What follows is a brief collection of statements made this week, on both the national and local levels, that have tried to put this tragedy into perspective. We at the Collegian ask that you too make time in your day to consider what has happened, to form your own opinion based on as wide a variety of sources as you can construct. Moving on will take a nationwide effort, an effort that will ultimately begin with each and every one of you.

"Every member of our campus community has been gravely affected by [Tuesday's] attacks. However, in the wake of these events, we must focus not on the hate and ignorance which sponsored these deplorable acts, but rather on the sense of community demonstrated when 4,000 members of our campus community joined together at a vigil in remembrance, in grievance, in understanding and in solidarity. We, the SGA, would like to make sure that every student knows that we are here to advocate on your behalf and will continue to provide support for you in any way that we can."
- John Sheehan, Aaron Saunders and Jon Laubinger

"Those acts of mass murder were intended to frighten our nation into chaos and retreat. But they have failed. Our country is strong. A great people has been moved to defend a great nation. Terrorist attacks can shake the foundations of our biggest buildings, but they cannot touch the foundation of America. These acts shatter steel, but they cannot dent the steel of American resolve.
Today, our nation saw evil, the very worst of human nature, and we responded with the best of America, with the daring of our rescue workers, with the caring for strangers and neighbors who came to give blood and help in any way they could."
- President George W. Bush

"We can only imagine the terror and carnage there and the many, many innocent people who have lost their lives...This mass terrorism is the new evil in our world today. It is perpetrated by fanatics who are utterly indifferent to the sanctity of life."
- British Prime Minister Tony Blair

"We worried about the feelings of the students, faculty and staff, feelings not yet expressed... feelings that may not always represent our best selves, but feelings that are all too human...While we go forward as a community we must be mindful and respectful of each individual as individual choices are made about how to grieve, whatever those choices are...as grieve we all must."
- Interim Chancellor Marcellette G. Williams

Crossing generational lines:

how a tragedy has (almost) repeated itself

There's a story my late grandmother used to tell me when I was a little girl. It's a tale set in a time long ago, in a place far, far away when she was a young newlywed in her homeland of Hawaii. It was a different time, when the rest of the world was at war, and she felt protected by the knowledge that violence was restricted from American shores, relegated to foreign lands she knew little of. America held a neutral stance and the war seemed a world away. What added to her comfort was the fact that she was further sheltered by the madness, by the hostility in the isolated isles of the Pacific, away from the mainland U.S. Barely older than I am now, my grandmother spent the days eagerly awaiting her first-born child and tending to the pineapple crops in the lush fields of Maui. She led a peaceful, tranquil existence with the other Polynesian people. Then came that fateful day in December in 1941, when her hope and youthful idealism were shattered in an instant when the Japanese attacked without warning.

TEHANI SCHNEIDER

Her story became one centered around paradise lost, and innocence destroyed. It's a story of death and destruction, of fear and despair, of bravery and comradice. But ultimately, it's a story of good overcoming evil.

And it's a story I'd never thought I'd see in my lifetime.

So much has been written, so much has been said of how the shocking events on Tuesday reflect that of Pearl Harbor. I echo that sentiment, but my purpose in writing this column is to offer my own perspective, not to enlighten anyone, but to share in the infinity of grief and immeasurable disbelief that will never fully subside.

I don't believe what happened Tuesday has sunk in quite yet. All I could do three days ago was stare in mute horror at the television, transfixed at the sickening, unforgettable images of war-torn New York and wounded Washington, of the plane smashing into the second tower, as buildings that were as familiar to me as my own backyard as a child plummeted to the ground, as terrified onlookers watched, as the primary source of the U.S. military was set ablaze. All these images continuously played over and over, as if the more they were shown; the more this could become a reality. But it hasn't yet for me. It's still incomprehensible. And like so many others, this tragedy has hit so close to home for me. My father works near the World Trade Center in the city, and although he was fortunate enough to emerge unscathed, I know other people whose children I once babysat for, friends of my family, or others through the intermittent six degrees of separation, who lost their lives.

In many ways, my viewpoint of the tragedy mirrors my grandmother's story. I never truly believed that such a disaster could ever happen again, that anything could ever replicate, or even surpass December 7, 1941. Perhaps my beliefs were the consequence of national arrogance, of knowing, and reveling subconsciously in the fact that I am a citizen of the most powerful and wealthiest country in the world. Perhaps it was naiveté, which goes hand-in hand with youth. Perhaps it was just plain ignorance on my part, as I will readily admit I know very little of international affairs. Whatever I might have believed, my faith suffered a mortal blow on Tuesday, when my world, along with so many others was forever changed. That aura of invincibility I once held, that so many Americans once held, is gone, and can never be replaced.

My generation has never experienced a calamity of this magnitude, and I pray we never see one like this again. Never before has there been something that has directly affected so many people: those who lost loved ones, those still clinging to hope, those who as I write this, are still working tirelessly to search through the rubble, those with blind emotions churning who desire retaliation, and those who feel empathy for those lost, even if they have not lost someone dear to them. Yet we have all lost something in this tragedy, if not someone.

So much has also been said of how the New York City skyline will never be the same, and although it seems superfluous to think about it in a time like this, the truth of the matter is, the three buildings targeted by the terrorists stood as landmarks of American prestige and power. It became even more frightening to learn that the White House and Air Force One were also on the hit list. Now the landscape of the United States has been changed forever, and it remains to be seen of the drastic effect this disaster will have on the economy.

I know I can offer little solace during this time, and my thoughts are still a jumble of mixed emotions, so forgive me if some of what I have said seems callous. Certainly my perspective at this point borders more on becoming emotional, than on being analytical. I feel there's too much speculation at this point to pin the blame on Osama Bin Laden and his followers or another group of terrorists, and with constant updates and findings in the ongoing investigation, part of what I have written here will probably be outdated by press time.

Yet I know that even if the perpetrators of these abominable acts are eventually caught and punished, justice will never be fully achieved. In times of tragedy, our duty becomes not to understand, because truthfully we will never comprehend why this happened. Those who do hold the greatest regard for human life could never possibly understand how these suicide bombers could carry out such a calculated plan with cold-blooded, merciless ease. The only thing we can do now is learn how to cope with this, and eventually try to move on, although we will never again reach the degree of normalcy, as it was defined before Tuesday, September 11, 2001.

So, do your part to help. Contact the Red Cross. Give blood, because maybe you could save a life. The irony of all tragedies is that when faced with the greatest of evils, people will unite to bring about good and do their best to restore hope and faith. The one thing evil can never kill is the human spirit. Remember that.

Letters: breaking down the cause of a tragedy

To the editor:

Since arriving here in Amherst a little over a year ago, I have been passively interested and a bit amused at the political landscape on the campus here at the University of Massachusetts. Because I received my B.S. from a fairly conservative southern university, I felt that I never got the full "political enlightenment" that one generally associates with the atmosphere on college campuses throughout the nation. Until today, I have found it a unique experience to attend the polar opposite of my former institution, finding both advantages and disadvantages in each.

This being said, I was sickened by the editorial offered by Professor Bill Israel which was run in yesterday's edition of the Daily Collegian. One of the only positives coming out of [Tuesday's] heinous events in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania is that our nation seems even stronger and more determined. Our national spirit of cohesion was evident in the faces of rescue workers, mayors, governors, congresswomen and congressmen, presidential cabinet members, and finally in the face of our president, George Bush Jr. In a show of solidarity never seen in my generation, people from all political parties and affiliations came together to pray, meditate and offer support to one another as well as those directly affected by this tragedy.

In contrast, Professor Israel took it upon himself to point fingers of blame even before the dust and smoldering ash over our national monuments settled to earth, even before the roll call of those passed has been penned. Rather than offering consoling thoughts or hopeful words for those devastated by this tragedy, Israel used the shock of the moment to voice his obviously biased objection to the results of a presidential election long over. In addition, Israel misleads readers by insinuating that our president was "campaigning for brother Jeb" even following the news of the tragedy in New York. He further insinuates that Bush intentionally "bid out" in Louisiana just as he did "during the Vietnam War". If Israel is so deluded as to believe that President Bush jumped into a plane and told the pilot to go "as far from coastal danger as you can run", then perhaps we should question the merits of the faculty search committee here at UMass.

Even if one were to concede that Israel's opinions are valid on all fronts, one cannot overlook the obvious absence of tact in the timing of his statements. One of the relatively unique advantages that we as Americans have is the presence of public avenues for advocating change, including 1) political involvement through voting, 2) citizen employment in government and 3) media participation and involvement as afforded by the first amendment of our constitution. I would like to believe that as the healing process of our nation comes to a close months down the road, there will be plenty of "soap boxes" on which people such as Israel will be free to stand, whether on local, state or federal fronts, public or private. But for now, I would have preferred that such a commentary by Israel would have been something that he had kept to himself, completely out of respect for those whose minds are on those who have lost friends and family. I would have preferred that Israel give blood, or wave a flag, or offer counsel to students in distress.

Finally, my objection to Israel's insensitive comments is only equaled by my amazement at the apparent lack of judgment exercised by the staff of the Daily Collegian in its publication. Apparently the word "Professor" qualifies the biased ramblings of a bitter journalist as expert analysis. The leadership at our school newspaper is as much at fault for these inappropriate remarks as its original source and this insensitivity should not be passively abhorred by its readership. I encourage those who find this editorial to be objectionable to write those responsible for its publication.

Joel Anderson
Graduate student, Biology

To the editor:

I heard the statement "deafening silence" a few years ago, and this oxymoron didn't mean anything to me until about an hour ago. A professor in one of my classes asked everyone to be quiet for a few moments and to reflect on what has happened throughout the past 48 hours. I looked around me and I saw about 200 people who were terrified to move, whisper or make the slightest sound. This huge auditorium produced the most deafening noise I've ever heard. The strangest thing about this was that no one made a sound.

I went to my first vigil last night, and about 4,000 other people surrounded me. All or most of these kids were all about partying, playing sports, or doing whatever all of us do in our secure little lives. But for about a half hour, we all felt the need to stand in silence and listen to others talk about the tragedy. When none of us could justify, rectify or analyze this disaster, we all felt that we belonged there. When I left for the 15-minute walk back to my dorm, holding my single candle, I felt unfulfilled. Thousands of people lost their lives and this affected millions of people, and all I could do was sit in silence and hold a scented candle.

This is being said to be the worst attack on the country since Pearl Harbor. The scariest part of this is now realizing that this is history. My kids and grandkids will be reading about this in their U.S. History books 40 or 50 years from now. I'm 18. I'm not supposed to be living out history. That was for our parents to do. Not me. Not now.

Before I came to UMass, I was looking online for random quotes. Different ones popped on the screen ranging in topics from love, friendship, success and the future. In one of the categories came a quote that I will never forget, and it didn't hit home nor have a real meaning until yesterday. "One death is a tragedy. One million deaths is a statistic." This quote is right and wrong in certain aspects (not including the fact a million people did not lose their lives yesterday). However, yesterday was neither a single tragedy nor a statistic.

Yesterday was 20,000 tragedies. Everyone remembers where he or she was at certain defining moments in their lives. Our parents had JFK, Nixon and others. We had O.J., Clinton, Princess Di and now this. I'll never forget where I was on September 11, 2001 at 9:15 a.m. and there's nothing I wouldn't do to forget it.

Matthew Elder
Freshman, Pre-Journalism

To the editor:

It is a sad irony that you printed my response to Ken Campbell's "Look at U. S. Missile Policy" today. The terrible attacks upon New York and Washington, which have murdered perhaps as many as 50,000 people, demonstrate the futility of the proposed National Missile Defense system. Even if all the enormous problems the NMD poses had somehow been solved and the system were in place today, it would not have prevented the atrocities that we all witnessed on the TV news.

As I mentioned in my letter, the NMD only gives the other peoples of the earth more reasons to fear and distrust the USA. In my letter to your paper of September 10, I addressed this point as follows:

> "...if these other nations were to act on their fear and distrust by attacking the US, they could more effectively lay waste to this nation through the use of terrorist tactics—nerve gas or plutonium dissolved in the drinking water, neutron bombs left in brief cases a block from the White House, small pox at the county fair. The NMD, even functioning perfectly, will not and can not stop such attacks, and by provoking other nations to see us as a threat and an enemy, it in fact encourages them."

Obviously, as it turned out, our enemies needed only knives, commercial jets, and a willingness to die for the cause to kill more Americans in one day than anything since the Civil War.

Also, to briefly address Nathaniel Moger's point, even a terrorist as rich and ruthless as Osama Bin Laden needs the Taliban and the bases to have allowed him to establish in Afghanistan, however little he cares about what happens to Afghanis. If he, or anyone else, were to launch a ballistic missile attack on the USA, we would know where it came from. That would provide us with we lack now: a clear target. As much as the Taliban, or Saddam Hussein, or even Moammar Kadafi of Libya (remember him?) want or need a great and terrible enemy (like only we can provide, they most definitely do NOT want their entire nation reduced to radioactive rubble – and if they hit us with a nuclear missile, we would certainly retaliate in kind. That is the essence of the old doctrine of Mutual Assured Destruction. Ugly as it is, it protected us from nuclear missiles in the cold war, and it still does the job today.

In conclusion, then, I repeat that the United States is clearly threatened by terrorism, even nuclear terrorism, but the NMD will do nothing to protect us. The best way to defeat our enemies is not with a stick, but a carrot. Instead of continuing to bomb Iraq (for example), as we have done for ten years, let us rather rebuild it. It's easy for Iraqis to hate us when all we do is make them poor and miserable – it's another when we make them fat and happy.

And does anyone still think explosions are cool?

Michael S. Dow,
Graduate student, History of Science

To the editor:

Americans everywhere ought to find [Bill Israel's] article, "A policy of neglect and cowardice," shameful. Day and night the government and media begged us – despite a rising emotional tide – not to assign blame. Wednesday's Daily Collegian reflected the deep sorrow of the UMass community in the wake of the most horrible tragedy in American history. Although [Israel's] willingness to grapple with this difficult issue is well-intended, [his] article makes arrogant accusations that recklessly place blame without substantiation.

What gives you the authority to blame U.S. policy at the time when the perpetrators were not even known yet? How dare you imply that President Bush is a coward for diverting his plane from the White House, allegedly the terrorists' next target? Attacking Bush's abilities as a president and commander-in-chief without even giving him 24 hours to deal with the situation is simply unfair. Bush will be judged by what he does now, and your focus on the legitimacy of the Supreme Court's decision to afford him the presidency is badly timed.

It is ironic that [Israel] is blaming Israel, the first state in the world to declare a national day of mourning commemorating the disaster and one of the first countries to send a team to assist with the rescue efforts. It is also ironic that you are blaming Israel's policy of assassinating terrorists – many of them suicidal terrorists such as those who committed Tuesday's crime. No tears would have been shed if the U.S. had assassinated these terrorists preemptively. It ought to be the government's duty.

Journalists, and especially journalism professors, have a deep responsibility to adhere to the highest levels of ethics and integrity in writing articles. Wednesday's piece should have been composed as an analysis of facts and not used as a forum for assigning responsibility, the difference between news analysis and an opinion piece.

The article links the signing of the Oslo peace accord to the attack by stating that the latter occurred on the eight-year anniversary of the signing. Yet, a crucial fact was distorted; the day of the attack was not on the eighth anniversary of the Oslo peace accord's signing. That date is September 13, 2001.

Also, quotation marks were placed around the word terrorists when referring to those who committed this heinous act, making a mockery of the death and injury of thousands of people. If these are not terrorists, then who are?

The United States' "policy of neglect" is not to blame; rather, it is the venomous speeches of fundamentalist terrorist leaders that brought on Tuesday's tragedy. President Roosevelt, on January 6, 1941, decreed to Congress that one of the four freedoms of humanity is freedom from fear. Your article fears assigning blame where it truly belongs, and instead it attacks peace-loving democratic nations and, more disturbingly, the victims.

The fearful reality is that this world must now combat rational-thinking fundamentalists capable of carefully calculating, crafting, and executing horrific acts on innocents. To imply that this is a direct outgrowth of Washington's limited involvement in the Mideast and Israel's role in its ongoing conflict with the Palestinians is a national disgrace at best. It smacks of conspiracy theory. As Americans, our duty now is to stand by those affected by this horror and to bring the perpetrators to justice swiftly.

To the editor:

The tragic and almost indescribable events that took place on September 11, 2001, another day that will live in infamy, apparently are "the predictable result of American policy," says Prof. Bill Israel in his Collegian editorial yesterday. Using a catastrophe as that on Sept. 11 to propagate your views on an election, which didn't result in the way you feel it should have, is a disgrace. This is certainly not a time for one to be slandering his own country. No blame can be placed internally now, only the people who have wounded the United States of America should be held accountable.

And though it is true, that President Bush may not have been the "master-politician" Roosevelt was, no one will be. That comparison is absolutely ludicrous. Never before has a mistake of foreign policy, such as those with China or Cuba, ever given the right for a terrorist group or anyone else to attack the U.S. on American soil. No president has caused this. Mistakes have been made, but no error in judgment can justify in any way, shape or form the cowardly and brutal attack against our citizens. No foreign policy blunder would account for these terrorists to hijack not one but four airliners and use them as weapons against our good citizens. Perhaps the government has not properly handled itself in regard to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, but are we suddenly pointing fingers? [Israel] accuses the Palestinians outwardly, and as a journalism professor, you may want to realize fact from just an accusation. Though the media may drill into the U.S. that this is the work of Osama bin Laden, all of the Palestinians, you say, have now destroyed half of the eastern seaboard because we didn't listen to their pleas? This claim is just outrageous. What happened in New York and Washington on Tuesday is a daily occurrence in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza?

"How can we fail to see our policy has created zealots and suicide bombers?" Prof. Israel, our policy made none of this. Our policy toward Israel did not senselessly slaughter thousands upon thousands of lives. A terrorist did. A terrorist who, regardless of which country or cause we support, wanted the U.S. government vanquished.

The US has ceaselessly been trying to find a solution to what has been erupting in the Middle East. This is not a recent concept. However, our relations with Israel are not what caused this terrorist attack. The U.S. has left Sharon to take care of a so-called Palestinian refugee problem, but how can you completely ignore the acts of terrorism and murder of various groups, which simply will not negotiate a peaceful resolution? The conference in Durban was unfair. It was not a matter of the U.S. and Israel not facing the situation, it was simply a decision of truth, not going along with what was seemingly an orchestrated attempt against the United States to discredit us. We would not have this.

We compare Tuesday's events to Pearl Harbor, and rightly so. We do not have anything else in U.S. history to compare it to. However, the difference is that in WWII, we knew who our enemy was. We knew at whom to strike back. If we have a policy of "neglect and cowardice", we should let the families of those who lost so many in the destruction know. Perhaps they would want to know that their families died for what you seem to call "predictable."

To the editor:

There have been many reactions to the recent terrible terrorist attacks on this country and its people in New York and Washington DC. These have included disbelief, shock, horror and outrage, as well as prayers and sympathy for, and attempts to aid those directly affected. It was probably inevitable, though, that some people would try to use these events to further their own causes. This is the category into which the obscene attempt of Prof. Bill Israel to push his political agenda falls.

There are many people living in desperate situations all around the world. Bill Israel implies that if the U.S. does not ameliorate their conditions we should expect them to carry out terrorist attacks on our country. This is complete nonsense. At this point we do not know the identities of the perpetrators of these actions, although much suspicion seems to be falling on Osama bin Laden. If he is, in fact, responsible, then the ostensible cause of the attacks is the presence of U.S., i.e. non-Muslim, troops in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, and not the status of Palestinians or their conflict with the State of Israel.

Regardless of what you think of him or his actions decades ago, it does no good to insult the President of the U.S. at a time like this. Nevertheless, Bill Israel seems to revel in such activity, an activity which, in my opinion, helps the terrorists more than it helps the citizens of the U.S. or responsible people anywhere else.

THE OTHERS
Starring Nicole Kidman
Directed by Alejandro Amenábar
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

I hate it when, in horror movies, someone is walking through his house, perhaps on his way to the kitchen for a late-night snack, and he doesn't bother to turn on the lights as he goes. There's also the instance in horror films where the killer is pursuing the protagonist and all the doors are locked. Audiences have wised up in recent years, and these old-fashioned cliches no longer have the ability to spook us as they once did when we were more naive moviegoers.

In The Others, such formulas actually make sense. It's set sometime post World War II, where Nicole Kidman's Grace lives in a large home with her two children. The kids suffer from a disease where light makes them ill and because of that, all curtains are drawn in the vast mansion, and there are no light fixtures of any kind. The lack of lighting is justified because, as Kidman's character explains, the Nazis kept cutting the power, so they learned to live without it. We go along with it because it's logical to us. We get the creeps since the house is so dark for a reason, and not due to dim-witted explanations like the power went out (see House on Haunted Hill – no, on second thought don't). Also, because of their vulnerability to brightness, one door must be closed and locked before another one is opened, so that no light spills into the room. This proves to be just as believable. When characters are running through the house in terror, and can't get into the locked rooms, we have been cleverly convinced that this is legitimate.

A spooky setting is of utmost importance when trying to make people scared, and The Others, being set on an island in the British Isles, does the trick. Much like Grace, the audience can feel the isolation and lack of connection of what it must be like to live there. Adding to the eeriness of the location is that it's always shrouded in fog. Even when Grace tries to go to town to seek help, the mist envelops her, and she must turn back. The atmosphere plays just as key a part in making us frightened.

The Others is a ghost story, and we do get our fair share of creaks in the floorboards, hushed voices in the dark, and visions from the otherworld. The scene where an elderly woman takes possession of Grace's daughter is among the most frightening, but even shots of light seeping out from underneath doors, and the piano that starts to play by itself are efficient in provoking anxiety. Even the sudden reappearance of Grace's husband, who she believes was lost in the war, is creepy, even though we should be happy for her that he has safely returned. This is intentional, of course. The Others is the kind of film you want to watch twice, just so you can pick up the hints and foreshadows of what eventually conspires at the end. The husband's reappearance is a foreshadowing technique if not a subtle one, which makes no sense right away, but later on manages to serve a purpose.

There are some things, however, that do not exactly add up. For instance, It's baffling why Grace's husband returns in a uniform typical of World War I when we know for certain that he fought in WWII. At one point, Grace tells her gardener to try and locate a small cemetery on the property, but it's hard to believe that she has lived there so long and never found it herself. The unexpected ending will mostly make sense at first viewing, but the epilogue of the film might be best understood on VCR or DVD, where you can pause and rewind it, as you try to make out these smaller subplots that the characters are summing up.

Alejandro Amenabar, who wrote and directed the film, has crafted a modern masterpiece with The Others. It takes all of our preconceived notions of ghost stories and flips them wildly over. The most surprising thing is that the filmmakers pull a fast one on us, and for once we can say that this horror film was not like the others.

(U-WIRE) NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. – MTV has created another new game show, FREE RIDE, which will showcase three college students selected from Rutgers, William Patterson and the University of Connecticut. An MTV camera crew will follow the contestants around for a day and on Oct. 20, the students' wits will be tested to see which one deserves the FREE RIDE. MTV will pay off the winner's student loans.

More than 300 students from Rutgers-New Brunswick auditioned for the show. "We are looking for students who have student loans, with good 'poor' stories, personality, [are] camera friendly and who are fun to watch," the casting director Shadow said.

"It's good how they are trying to help out students [with loans]," Douglass College senior Tina Ridan said.

Cook College junior Kristine Yates also supported the show. "I have a lot of loans that need to get paid off, and why not MTV?"

"We are hoping to find someone deserving, smart, and active in [his] school," said Jennifer Bonadio, senior production assistant.

MTV intern of only two days, Laura Suggs, said many students struggle through college by working too many jobs and worrying about finances.

"I definitely have a lot of loans to pay off, 'cause college is very expensive," Livingston College first-year student Kelly Graham said.

During the auditions, MTV asked students to stand in front of the camera and answer questions from the casting director, which ranged from "What is the most embarrassing thing that you have ever done for money?" to "Why should MTV pick you?"

Douglas College first-year student Dorothy Michalek said, "I am not wacky. I am normal, but I am willing to make a fool of myself."

Randy rocks; Ozomatli brilliant; Priest pathetic

JUDAS PRIEST
Demolition
Atlantic

Man, is this bad.

That isn't to say that I expected it to be the defining album of Priest's legendary career. But man, at least I expected it to be better than or equal to Ram It Down or Jugulator. Those aren't lofty standards to meet – but Demolition manages to fall pathetically short of them. If Priest doesn't finally let it go after this stinker, then either Glenn Tipton still has a grandson to put through college or he's stupider than even this album's songwriting would have you believe.

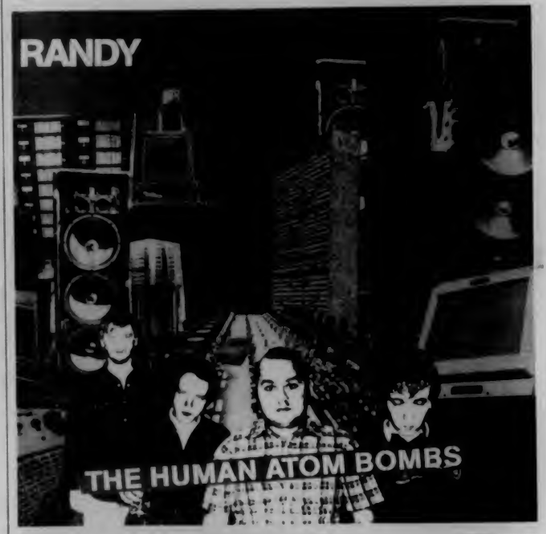
Arts Editor Mike Delano may think that "Metal Messiah" is cool mersh for it's camp value as a trashy, Manowar-style homage to the genre, but I can't even find the joy in that. Demolition hits bad, progresses through to comically bad, and then, finally, moves even past that to just hang-your-head-in-disgust pathetic ness. It's even more sad because you can feel th earnestness in every note they really think that this is good. This is the band that crafted classics like "Victim of Changes" and "Electric Eye" – you'd think they would know better. Alas, how the mighty have fallen.

Every drawn-out slow instrumental intro, every as-inine lyric, like "I cursed to kill/On my 6-50 Bonneville," every Halford cop-squeal from the Ripper – it all makes me sick. And bassist Ian Hill looks worse off than Ozzy, which you wouldn't believe unless you saw the picture of him in the liner notes. He seriously looks like he has to eat live human brains to sustain his blasphemous state of living death.

The only good thing to come out of Priest releasing this steaming pile is Ted Leo's kickass cover of "Grinder" from their Stained Dead album. Buy that and leave Demolition rotting on the racks where it and Judas Priest belong. (Rob Schulze)

RANDY
The Human Atom Bombs
Burning Heart

After listening to the Randy album a couple of times, I was going to write a short review that proclaimed the disc so inspirational that I spent the time I would have spent writing a review creating something of my own. I did that, but after deciding that a clip like that would be a little too clever, I'm back to tell you why The Human Atom Bombs is such a great album.



I can tell you first of all that I get the same feeling when I listen to this album as I do when I listen to Minor Threat's Complete Discography or Bad Religion's All Ages. The music just feels so alive. Forgive me if this sounds like a my-first-punk-record review, but I'm telling the truth when I say this record can bring even the firmest hold mohawks back to square one.

Randy is having a hell of a good time here, too. They're pushing an agenda, but it feels first and foremost that they're here to make music. You can jump on the bandwagon and sing-a-long about Karl Marx and Spanish anarchists, but this stuff is so much fun that even those who see Randy's politics as ridiculous won't be able to avoid catching "the rockin' pneumonia and the punk-rock flu." The world will be a better place when Bob Novak hosts Crossfire in a Randy T-shirt.

Being a dirty lefty myself, however, I love hearing these Swedes write about stuff that's actually on my mind. "Addicts of Communication" is a beautiful love letter to all those quivering Instant Messenger slaves and cell phone addicts. "I Don't Need Love" reminds you that the most important thing in life is not getting a job and counting money. Randy doesn't think about changing the world all the time though, in fact much of the time they're content with just enjoying it. "Summer of Bros" is about going for midnight swims with a bunch of friends, while "Punk Rock City" is a dream about a city where there are cool punk rock shows all the time.

Basically, The Human Atom Bombs makes me want to do something - drive faster, be nice, create something, and just plain makes me happy every time I hear it. And those are my favorite kinds of records. (Michael Delano)

OZOMATLI
Embrace the Chaos
Interscope

Man, I don't even speak Spanish and I think that Ozomatli is great. Their infectious traditional latino/rock/hip hop music hybrid enters your brain and your limbs and doesn't leave until you've danced to the last note, and even then you'll be singing lyrics you can't understand in the shower the next morning.

The problem with the LA eight-piece band's latest album, Embrace the Chaos, is that they don't seem to understand just what geniuses they are, and weigh themselves down with cumbersome hip-hop guests on five of the eleven songs. Medusa may all be well and good, but her rapping and the generic turntables-and-beat background on "Vocal Artillery" could be from any studio band on any hip-hop album. The only thing redeeming the song is the smooth brass sound flowing in the background at times, something that comes from with the band and not from without. Only De La Soul has a respectable appearance; guest spots from Common, Justin Ponce and Will.i.am are all wasted.

When the band hits it, though, it's an unforgettable experience. The lyrics sung by the band (mostly from the throats of trumpet player Asdru Sierra and guitarist Raul Pacheco) are entirely in Spanish but it really, really doesn't matter. Leadoff track "Pa Lante" booms – booms! – out of the speakers with horns and guitars blaring, a fast-paced masterpiece. At the other end of the spectrum, "Timido" features a slower pace, classic Spanish guitar, and a marvelous brass interlude. The songs are flawless, perfectly produced gems. I really can't think of too much to say – I mean, 'well, they have horns, guitars, a couple drummers and speak Spanish' cannot convey the passion and joy of these songs. They have to be heard to be understood.

Ozomatli really does transcend barriers. (I'm a metalhead. I totally enjoy this CD. You do the math.) It doesn't matter if you're Hispanic, Spanish-speaking, or a lily-white New Englander like me. The songs where the band dilutes themselves with the dubious talents of others are a serious let-down on the overall album, but the six untainted tunes alone are worth the price of admission. NFL erases slate

Stoppage first of its kind

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

After further review, the ruling on the field stands: there will be no NFL games this weekend.

Commissioner Paul Tagliabue rendered his final decision on the matter yesterday morning, after reportedly deliberating for several days and weighing input from dozens of individuals both in and out of football.

"We in the National Football League have decided that our priorities for this weekend are to pause, breath and reflect," Tagliabue said in an official statement from the league office. "It is a time to tend to families and neighbors and all those wounded by these horrific acts of terrorism."

The postponement is the first-ever stoppage of NFL play not related to a strike.

The commissioner's decision apparently complies with the majority opinion of the NFL Players Association. ESPN reported that NFLPA executive director Gene Upshaw held a conference call Wednesday night to discuss the issue with player representatives, who subsequently voted 17-11 in favor of the cancellation.

"Football is a sport of passion. What we need more than anything else right now is compassion," Buffalo Bills defensive end Phil Hansen told ESPN's Len Pasquarelli. "The country needs to get through this, and it doesn't have to have any kind of diversion like football to do that."

The most vehement opposition to playing this weekend came, understandably, from the players on metropolitan New York's two teams. Player reps Michael Strahan of the Giants and Kevin Mawae of the Jets reportedly had a profound influence on the NFLPA vote.

"The New York teams obviously had a very focused interest, especially the Giants, whose practice facilities overlook where the Twin Towers were," said John Kasay of Carolina. "That had a profound impact on those guys. So, it was helpful and very beneficial for everyone on that call to listen and hear what was going on around the country."

The decision also seemed to please a number of owners, several of whom participated in a conference call with Tagliabue a few hours prior to the announcement. Owners Wellington Mara of the New York Giants and Art Modell of the Baltimore Ravens were reportedly two of the most vocal proponents of the cancellation.

"We've always been a league that takes the lead in things like this," Mara said. "And I'm proud that we did that with this [decision] by the commissioner."

History may also have played a part in Tagliabue's decision. Both the commissioner and at least one owner made reference yesterday to November of 1963, when the league allowed games to go on a mere two days after President John F. Kennedy was assassinated. Then-commissioner Pete Rozelle later said it was the worst decision he made in his 29 years in the position.

"I have experienced the post-Kennedy syndrome and it was very difficult," said Mara, whose team was scheduled to host Green Bay at Giants Stadium on Sunday. "I think it would have been even more difficult because you have the constant reminder of the smoke."

Giants Stadium is located 10 miles southwest of the World Trade Center, and has been used as a staging area for emergency vehicles involved in the rescue and recovery operation there.

Even if Tagliabue hadn't cancelled this weekend's games, the full slate of scheduled contests probably would not have been played. The league had already stated that the three teams "at ground zero" – the Giants, Jets and Washington Redskins – would be exempted from taking the field.

A representative from the White House said that while the government had been consulted on the issue, the ultimate decision was left up to the league.

"We asked them to use their best judgment about whether to proceed," administration spokeswoman Anne Womack said.

Sentiment wasn't all positive following Tagliabue's announcement. Despite Modell's support of the cancellation, Ravens head coach Brian Billick expressed concern that taking the weekend off might send the wrong message to those who perpetrated Tuesday's attacks.

"I don't want cowards to dictate what we do in this country," Billick said.

Information from wire sources was used in this article.

AMERICA NEEDS ITS FOOTBALL

Football is a relatively simple game. You kick the ball, you throw the ball, you catch the ball. Simple.

Right now, America desperately needs this simple game to help make sense of a mad, mad world.

In the wake of the worst terrorist attacks ever on American soil, the NFL has decided to cancel all games for this weekend. Players from several teams had already threatened to boycott, and Buffalo's Phil Hansen had offered to forego his weekly paycheck in lieu of taking the field.

But with the exception of the "ground zero" teams (the Jets, Giants and Redskins), the best thing that the league's pros could have possibly done for themselves and their country is play football this weekend.

The very nature of terrorism, the very thing that makes it such an effective weapon, is that it shatters all semblances of normalcy and replaces our precious comfort with feelings of helplessness.

In the aftermath of Tuesday's attacks, the U.S. was left in a state of stunned disbelief to wonder when and if things would ever return to normal.

And while reflection and grief are integral parts of the healing process, an equally important component is the security of knowing that our lives and livelihoods will persevere despite the horrible wounds that we as a nation have suffered. That security can only be attained by picking up the pieces and moving on, by honoring those who have fallen in the best way possible: deriving strength from their losses.

That is why allowing the NFL to retake the field is so important. Football is, maybe more so than any other sport, a symbol of our nation's resilience. The battle of wills waged on the gridiron is a microcosm of the struggles and conquests that we as a nation have experienced and must continue to experience.

Watching these athletes rise to challenge after challenge between the white lines can only bolster our nation's resolve off the field.

And just as the soldiers of the NFL triumph only through unity and teamwork, our nation must, in this its darkest hour, rely on the same camaraderie. The words "united we stand, divided we fall" have never been truer or more timely.

In a society as culturally and ethnically diverse as ours, what unifying force exists that is more powerful and effective than football?

Of course, the wounds in New York and our nation's capital are still too fresh for the players there to turn back to football. A game with columns of smoke still rising in its background would do little to hasten the healing process.

But for the rest of the nation, NFL football would provide more than just an escape or a therapy. It would bring back hope and pride to a people who so desperately need it; it would help stabilize a nation that has been rocked to its core by an unspeakable act.

Quite a feat for such a simple game.

While the men's soccer team did not step on to the practice field Wednesday, they did convene to make the decision whether or not to play this weekend and to decide if it was in the best interest to play in the games remaining this season where flying would be the source of transportation. The Minutemen felt as though they were ready to continue play, and that flying was something everyone is willing to do for the game.

"It was weird, awkward," Rhodes said. "But we talked about it as a team and we are fine with it."

The Minutemen continued with light practice yesterday and will practice today to prepare themselves for the rest of the season. O'Quinn said the team is still in shock and that has resulted in a slow week. With the team still shell- shocked, O'Quinn said it was hard for the team to keep focus in this week of tragedy.

"We as a team need to start getting back to our normal schedule," O'Quinn said.

In a strike of luck, senior tri-captain back J.R. Pouncey will return to the field after being absent since the last meeting against Hartford. Pouncey left the game in the second half two weeks ago after pulling his left groin muscle.

The events that changed America's history forever have shaken up the sports world around the country. While a majority of UMass athletic events have been canceled or postponed, the men's soccer team feels it will be best to get back to the playing field on Sunday.

"Our spirits are high and we're ready to go," Rhodes said.

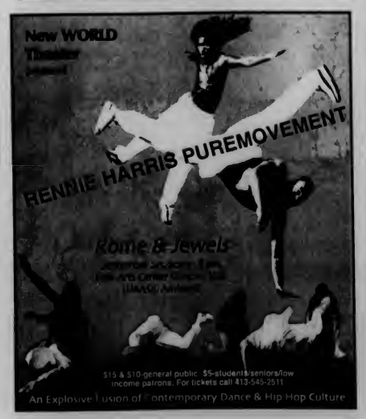
time triumph over Boston College and will be looking to get back on track after being shut out by UConn.

The lone UMass bright spot against the Huskies was the play of senior goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky. The Dallas, TX native stopped six UConn shots giving her fourteen for the season. She has been strong all season for UMass and will need to be in top form to shut down a Bearcat attack that has scored 12 times in its four games this season.

However, the key to Sunday's match will be focus. The game will likely be won by whichever team can come out and put the week's tragic events behind them with less trouble.

"It feels weird to go out and play," Lilly said. "Soccer is just not a big deal right now, but we have to go on."



[Tuesday's tragedy] really puts it all in perspective," Cook added.

Following Sunday's match the Minutewomen will have seven days worth of practice before opening their Atlantic 10 schedule when they play host to the University of Rhode Island Rams.

Boston U. loses three former athletes in attacks

By Pete Daly
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

(U-WIRE) BOSTON - As the events unfold following Tuesday's massive American tragedy at the World Trade Center in New York City and at the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., the attack seems more inescapable with each passing day as three former Boston University athletes lost their lives on board two of the doomed flights.

Sports Information Director Ed Carpenter confirmed Wednesday that former BU hockey player Mark Bavis of West Newton, former swimmer Tom McGuiness and former football player Brian Sweeney were killed when the planes smashed into the twin towers of the World Trade Center in New York City.

McGuiness, a four-year swimmer for the Terriers during the late 1970s and early 1980s, was the co-pilot of American Airlines Flight 11 that departed from Logan Airport in Boston, was hijacked and crashed into the North Tower of the World Trade Center at 8:45 a.m. Tuesday.

Bavis was traveling cross-country on United Airlines Flight 175 from Boston to Los Angeles when his airliner became the second hijacked plane in the synchronized terrorist attack on American soil and plunged into a fiery explosion after colliding with the South Tower at 9:03 a.m.

Sweeney, 38, of Barnstable, Mass., was also aboard Flight 175, and it is confirmed that the former BU defensive lineman is among those dead in the worst acts of terrorism in American history.

Some of the most dramatic news in the wake of the attacks were reports that people aboard the hijacked flights succeeded in making cellular phone calls to loved ones before the planes went down.

Sweeney was among the brave souls who foresaw what might happen and called.

"He told me he loved me," Brian's wife, Julie Sweeney told the Cape Cod Times. "He said to live a long life and to be happy. And he said he'd see me again soon."

Bavis, who worked as an amateur scout for the Los Angeles Kings, graduated in 1993 after playing hockey at Boston University for four years as a winger. A Roslindale native, Bavis and his twin brother Mike played on the team together and both shared the Bennett McInnis Memorial Award for team spirit in their sophomore and junior seasons. During his senior season in 1992-93, Bavis played in all 40 games for BU, scoring 14 goals and adding 10 assists for 24 points. He earned a degree from BU's Metropolitan College.

Bavis was 31 years old and lived in West Newton.

News of the tragedy and Bavis's death rippled through the BU hockey community. BU coach Jack Parker held a small press conference yesterday to express his sympathy.

"He was a great guy and it's a hard hit to our program because his brother [Mike] is an assistant here and [Mark] was a terrific player for us for four years," Parker said. "As I've said earlier, it's hard to perceive it, of one without the other. They were always the Bavis twins, they were always the Bavi."

Parker and the BU hockey team held a meeting yesterday afternoon to discuss the tragedy and to console one another. It was too early to tell yesterday if any memorial or commemoration for Mark Bavis would be established.

"We spoke to [the team] a little bit [Tuesday] and called off whatever they were doing," Parker said.

Sweeney was the third former BU athlete that was killed in the attacks on New York. He played defensive end during his senior year at BU after playing a reserve role on the offensive line as a lineman and nose guard. He graduated in 1986 from the College of Engineering.

He was a native of Spencer, Mass., and graduated from David Prouty High School. Sweeney was a starting defensive end and guard in high school and was the co-captain of the team. He made the Worcester Telegram and Gazette's Super Team as a guard and played in the Shriner's Game. Sweeney also lettered in track, placing eighth in the state in discus in 1982.

Former BU swimmer Tom McGuiness, 42, of Portsmouth, N.H., co-piloted the ill-fated Flight 11, whose thunderous crash into the New York City skyline was the first attack that sent the news around the country that something was terribly wrong.

The losses of these three alumni have struck an emotionally devastating chord with the BU athletic community. Perhaps the ultimate goal of the terrorists all along, the tragedy's far-reaching arms have touched Americans everywhere, including Terrier players, coaches, staff and friends.

Not since the shock of learning BU freshman hockey player Travis Roy was paralyzed on the ice of Walter Brown Arena on October 20, 1995, has Boston University athletics been so adversely affected. While Roy has persevered in the face of misfortune, Sweeney, Bavis and McGuiness will not have that opportunity.

This is not the first catastrophic event to have deflated Parker, but he said it doesn't get easier to handle.

"We've had a few tragedies like this in the past. Kevin Mutch was a former player of ours and the same thing happened to him," Parker said. "I've had a number of former players die like that; Bennett McInnis who got killed in an automobile accident in the '60s just before he got to BU and the Travis Roy situation."

"Some shocking situations have happened before, but this is as tough to take as any of them I guess," Parker said.

Carpenter expressed sentiments that have resonated in classrooms, homes, shopping centers and churches throughout the nation.

"Well, I think what happens is it really hits close to home," Carpenter said. "When it suddenly hits your family and the BU family, it takes on a whole different meaning. This is really home."

A similar battlefield in 2002

By Matthew F. Sacco

Four months removed from the most inexplicable snubbing in NCAA tournament history, the sour taste is still eminent in the collective mouth of the Massachusetts lacrosse community.

After completing possibly the most successful season in UMass lax history with a 15-5 smacking of Brown, the Minutemen (12-2) were deemed unworthy of an NCAA tournament bid (mostly due to their supposed weak schedule). Most experts surmised that if UMass had managed to defeat either ranked Georgetown or title game runner up Syracuse, then the committee's ignorance would not have occurred.

With the NCAA's guidelines for a tournament now laid out in front of him, Cannella has brought in a solid recruiting class to retool his squad after the graduation of 12 seniors. Unfortunately the UMass sideline leader did not address the team's most calling drawback from a year ago – the schedule.

In a tentative schedule released a few days ago the Minutemen will have only one change in opponent. Instead of facing national doormat Boston College, the Maroon and White will face off against the University of Hartford.

The 2002 slate looks like a lacrosse version of the Usual Suspects. UMass will again take on Hofstra in the season opener before consecutive road trips to Georgetown and Syracuse in later weeks. Unfortunately the 2002 schedule lacks the fourth high quality opponent that would have been so essential just one year ago.

With top notch net filler Rich Kunkel departing along with adroit feeder Keith Gabrielli, Cannella brought in a recruiting class that is knee deep in twine tickling talent.

"We are very excited," Cannella said. "We feel like we are bringing in a very good class."

For the second year in a row a Canadian (Jeff Zywcki in 2000) headlines a class of UMass recruits. Craig Conn, who Cannella calls a "great finisher" is a very talented attack man who will, like Zywicki, need to adjust from the Canadian way of box lacrosse to the outdoor American style.

Joining Conn at attack is Gene Tundo from Orchard Park, NY. Tundo is a consumniate assist man who sees the field very well, as well as being a very effective defensive player on opponents clearing attempts.

At midfield Cannella has brought in some burners to make the trademark transition offense that much more scary. Jason Capitman and Chris Doyle both have a shot to see time immediately, a bold statement considering the company they are joining in Amherst.

Matt Garcia and Brett Grandmont headline the defensive newcomers. They will certainly add speed to a defense that fields two monsters in Tom Fallon (6-4, 240 lbs.) and Matt McFarland (6-3, 210 lbs.) They are two fundamentally sound players which will make them easy to coach and easy to play.

With the departure of three year starting goaltender Chris Campolettano, Cannella brought in two high school All-Americans who could immediately compete for playing time. Bill Schell and Alex Pirani will likely compete with 2001 backup Rob Schneider for the starting job in February.

This class has speed. That fact alone is a testament to the new face of UMass lacrosse. Amherst is no longer a safe haven for plodding defensive squads. Eighteen goal outbursts are now the norm in the Pioneer Valley, so if this recruiting class says anything it warns: "get used to it!"

Kevin Leveille, seen here matching wits with a rival Hoya, and the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will seek revenge against Georgetown this year after losing to them by one goal last season at Garber Field.

Horoscopes

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may be misunderstanding someone else's intentions. Before jumping to conclusions, then, be sure you're getting the whole story.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You may get fed up waiting for someone to come through – yet again! Why don't you do it all yourself? Save five bucks, and still get the 'A.'

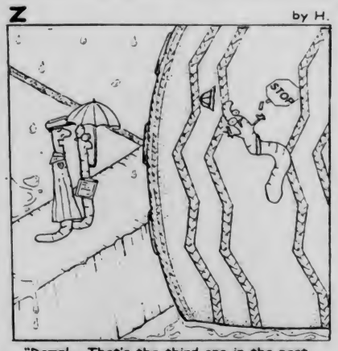
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You'll benefit from a surprise revelation toward midday, which should allow you to do better work when you need to – at a moment's notice.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – A little flattery can work wonder today and you're likely to find yourself ahead of the game when darkness falls.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Concentrate on doing as much as you can to increase potential on the homefront. You can prove yourself in a manner that may surprise even you.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Focus on the positive today, and don't let anyone talk you out of doing those things you think are right and true. Follow your instincts.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – When you ask for opinions today you must be prepared to get the truth – particularly from any Aries natives who aren't about to hold back.



TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may have trouble getting past someone's formidable defenses – but if anyone can do it, you can! Give yourself time, and don't get impatient.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Keep your criticism to a minimum today, and do what you can to see the positive in situations that others might recognize as only unfortunate.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Speak straight from the heart today and others are sure to listen. There is little chance that you'll be misunderstood at this time.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You may be called upon to fill someone else's shoes before the day is out. Purchase deodorizing innersoles and concentrate on doing those things that increase your own confidence.

Decision made to play

In position of tough circumstance, Minutewomen will square off Sunday

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team was supposed to be stepping onto the pitch in Athens, Ga. this afternoon to take on the University of Georgia Bulldogs. Instead the squad will be back on the training ground prepping for a Sunday match with the Binghamton Bearcats. The Minutewomen were told of the match, which will take place at Totman Field at 11 during Thursday's morning practice.

As a result of Tuesday's terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., the Minutewomen's southern road trip that was going to take them to Georgia this afternoon and to Auburn University on Sunday was cancelled. These games will not be made up.

"We would have gone if they had told us to," UMass captain Sarah Cook said. "But the coaches and administration felt that it was not in our best interest to go."

Now the Minutewomen (4-1) must change gears, and instead of preparing for a pair of road games against a pair of national powers, they must get ready for a home match with the Bearcats. The Bearcats (5-1) themselves have had their schedule altered as they were supposed to take on the Friars at Providence College on Sunday afternoon.

"We don't know much about them," Cook said. "But we can't sell them short because they aren't as big of a program as Georgia or Auburn."

"We were working on some different stuff in practice [on Thursday]," sophomore attacker Erin Lills said. "It's been a slight change from how we were getting ready for Georgia but Coach [Jim Rudy] is good at scouting our opponents."

Binghamton, which is in its first season in Division I soccer, comes into the match on the heels of a two-match winning streak after posting a 2-0 record at the Adidas Classic last weekend in Binghamton, N.Y. The Bearcats knocked off Iona in the first game 5-0, outshooting the Gaels 36-0, before edging past St. John's 1-0 in double overtime thanks to a goal from junior midfielder Mary Fazio.

UMass, currently ranked 21st in the nation, will be looking to put the memories of its last performance, a 5-0 loss at Totman Field against UConn, behind them. On that day the Huskies dominated the Minutewomen in all aspects, never letting the home side get into any sort of rhythm. The Minutewomen managed just four shots on the UConn net and constantly lost possession of the ball in the middle third of the field.

The key for UMass on Sunday will be getting on the board early – the team managed just one shot in the first 45 minutes against the Huskies and must show more of a killer instinct in the final third of the field if they are to knock off the Bearcats. If the Minutewomen are to get that crucial early goal it will more than likely come from one of two senior midfielders, either Brooke Bartlett or Katelyn Jones.

Both Bartlett, last season's leading scorer, and Jones, who has a team- leading three points so far this campaign, tallied in UMass' season opening, 4-3 double-over

Field hockey finds refuge at Garber

This upcoming weekend was supposed to be one of the most important times of the year for the Massachusetts field hockey team.

Two big out-of-conference tests against Louisville and Maryland loomed on the horizon for the Minutewomen, which would go a long way toward deciding just where UMass stood among the nation's elite.

However, the degree of what is considered important has changed for the time being, as a result of the terrorism attack on the Pentagon and World Trade Center this past Tuesday.

And suddenly, it is not the Cardinals or the Terrapins that hover in the minds of the Maroon and White, but instead making sense of what has recently occurred. For Head Coach Patty Shea, the well-being of her team took precedent over two of the biggest contests of the season.

"They're fine," Shea said about her players. "It is one of those things that is really hard to put in perspective. With what happened, we play video games in which we do that and see movies. In some ways it desensitizes us, but we can't let them control us. We have to keep on living.

"This touched people in different ways," she added. "We just have to pick up the pieces and move on."

Luckily, none of the Minutewomen's players were from the greater New York area, but that does not mean that they weren't affected by the recent attacks.

"Our players from New York are from western New York," Shea said. "So, it didn't hit us as hard as it did for other sports such as lacrosse, in which most of the team is from the greater New York area or Long Island, but we do have people with relatives there. Almost everyone is going to have a link to someone that was a victim."

Even though both games were cancelled this weekend, it does not mean that the UMass players have failed to pick up their sticks since the incident. On the contrary, the Maroon and White were out on the practice field just a few hours after the attack, which according to Shea, was a very good thing.

"We had practice the day it happened," the fifth-year coach said. "Because we needed to be there for each other in a different way. We needed to be with our university family.

"I think playing definitely helped," she added. "It is something they know and it was a chance to take out some frustration in a positive way instead of in a negative way. For anger, one of the best things for us was to be there because you don't think about it on the field. You can feel somewhat at ease."

However, it was a different type of practice than the Minutewomen were used to, in which Shea took on a different role from the norm in an attempt to console her players.

"I needed to be a coach in a different way just like the professors needed to be teachers in a different way," Shea said.

Her players were not the only ones whose minds were put at ease by picking up the field hockey stick. The UMass coach also benefited from getting away from the television for a while and smacking the ball around, although at that point, she was still uncertain of whether or not her team would be playing this weekend.

"At the time, the reality was that we didn't know if we were going to compete," Shea said. " So it was tough to deal with [the attack] while still preparing for the possibility of competition."

Now, of course, the team does know that the contests against Louisville and Maryland have been cancelled and will not be made up, shrinking Massachusetts' schedule from 20 to 18 games with the loss of play.

The Minutewomen next compete on September 22 when they travel to Ann Arbor, Michigan to take on Indiana.

Like female counterpart, men's soccer will take to Totman this weekend

During the Revolution Minutemen were always ready for battle. When called, they'd charge onto the scene in mere seconds – fully primed.

But there's a different mindset this week in Massachusetts. After Tuesday's national tragedy, it's terribly difficult to prepare for athletic competition.

"[The game] is not important this week," senior tri-captain Bryan O'Quinn, of the Massachusetts men's soccer team said yesterday. "We want to put this week behind us."

The Minutemen will host the University of Hartford Sunday in a previously unscheduled meeting, a small substitute for the cancelled UMass Classic. The Maroon and White planned to host Siena on Friday and San Francisco Saturday, but due to the tragic events earlier this week, San Francisco will be unable to travel to the East Coast.

"The University of San Francisco was scheduled to fly into Boston [on Wednesday]," Head Coach Sam Koch said. "We certainly understand and respect the fact that they will not be able to travel this weekend."

UMass played Hartford just two weeks ago down in Connecticut and fell to the Hawks 2-1. In the last two match-ups, the Minutemen have scored first, but have been held to just that one goal for the entirety of each game. They are looking to change things around on Sunday.

The Maroon and White have been on the practice field all week excluding Wednesday, and are looking forward to play the Hawks for a second time.

"We are definitely ready. We want to get them back," junior midfielder Derek Rhodes said.

Junior forward Jeff Deren said the team has become stronger in the past few weeks and that with a few position changes it has made, UMass will be ready.

"We know what to expect from them, and they know what to expect from us," Deren said.

Holding the Hartford game was decided by Coach Koch to ease the Minutemen into their first Atlantic 10 meeting against Rhode Island in two weeks. The team will be going into the Hartford game in an effort to move on.

"We're definitely ready," Rhodes said.

UMass just beat out URI last season in a 1-0 victory 4:58 into sudden-death overtime. The Rams, 2-0 on the season, had two cancellations this week – Tuesday's match with Providence and the Notre Dame Invitational Tournament this weekend.

Massachusetts reps cope with tragedy

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts delegations to the Senate and the House of Representatives have been commenting all week on Tuesday's tragedies in New York City and Washington DC.

Edward Kennedy (D-MA), the senior Senator from Massachusetts, said that national anger cannot be allowed to condemn Arabs or Muslims unjustly.

"In the aftermath of these shameful attacks, there is understandable anger across the nation. But it is wrong and irresponsible to jump to conclusions and make false accusations against Arabs and Muslims in our communities," Kennedy said. "Above all, we must guard against any acts of violence based on such bigotry. America's ideals are under attack too, and we must do all we can to uphold them at this difficult time."

Senator John Kerry (D-MA) released a statement following the attacks, citing that Massachusetts has suffered a particular loss.

"This is a difficult time for America, but particularly for those citizens of Massachusetts whose lives have been personally touched by this act of terror," Kerry said. "What happened this week was an attack on every American, but for many in Massachusetts it was particularly brutal: we have lost so many of our citizens at the hands of a cowardly and weak group of people. These families are in our hearts and in our prayers."

Massachusetts' Congressional representation also spoke out in reaction to the attacks, some in press releases, some on the House floor.

Congressman Barney Frank (D-MA), who represents the Fourth District in the House of Representatives, spoke out on September 11 after the attacks.

"We are unanimous in our resolve to demonstrate to them and to anyone else who doubts it that democracy remains a source of great strength. We will do that by waging a just war on this murderous gang, and on any governments that have been supportive of them," Frank said.

"But we will do it in a way that will show not simply our physical superiority, but our moral superiority, because we will maintain a respect for innocent life that this gang showed no respect for."

Frank, whose district includes the cities of Fall River and New Bedford, stressed that American democracy will not be dictated to by terrorists.

"We will do it by showing that, in a democracy, we decide our public policies by the deliberative process; and no effort to blackmail or terrorize us into changing what this country decides is in our best interests, domestically or internationally, is going to work. If anything, it will backfire. And we will do it by fully empowering our security forces, who did such a wonderful job yesterday in the face of terrible adversity, to defend ourselves internally and externally in a way that is both effective and fully consistent with our own democratic traditions."

However, Frank stressed that our enemies are terrorists, not Muslims.

"Let me make explicit what a number of us have said: our fight, our war, is with the murderous fanatics who perpetrated this act," Frank added. "It is not with all followers of the Islamic religion, it is not with people of Arab descent who live in this country or elsewhere."

In a debate over a resolution condemning the attacks, Representative William Delahunt (D-MA) of Massachusetts Tenth District expressed his grief over that tragedy.

"Across our nation, the grief and pain runs deep. Yesterday's events have seared and saddened the hearts of all Americans. Only as we put human faces on the thousands of casualties – our families, friends and constituents – can we even begin to comprehend the magnitude and impact of this unspeakable attack on our shores," Delahunt said. "People from my own area like Jeffrey Coombs of Abington, Massachusetts, aboard Flight 11; Brian Sweeney, a Barnstable resident, on Flight 175; and Stuart Meltzer, who worked on the 103rd floor of the World Trade Center, whose family on Cape Cod followed televised news reports with horror.

"In their names, we will find and punish those who committed these atrocities. This was an assault not only on America and her citizens, but on all that America represents," Delahunt added. "On the hopes and dreams of a world which yearns for peace, freedom, and justice under law."

Michael E. Capuano (D-MA), representing the Eighth Congressional District, sent his condolences to the families of the victims.

"First, let me express my profound sympathy for the victims of this terrible tragedy and their families. I cannot begin to imagine your pain, but my thoughts and prayers are with you. It is hard to find the words to express the sadness and outrage I feel over this act of terrorism and cowardice," Capuano said. "This is an assault on democracy and the very freedom that, until September 11, many of us took for granted. Rest assured that I will work with my col-

Professor speaks against Bush response

By Jake Liken
Collegian Staff

Despite poll after poll suggesting that the majority of Americans favor war with anyone involved in last Tuesday's terrorist attacks, Michael Klare, a Five College Professor of Peace and World Security Studies, has been vocal in his belief that the United States should take a very different course of action.

He wrote an article titled "How to Defeat bin Laden" for the Friday edition of salon.com, an on-line news magazine. In the article, he proposed that the US seek out bin Laden and try him as a mass murderer rather than prepare for a conventional war.

"There are many in Washington and around the country who believe that the United States should declare war on bin Laden – along with any governments that have given him assistance of one sort or another," Klare wrote. "Such action would undoubtedly help restore confidence in the power of the American nation, and provide a degree of satisfaction to those who crave retribution for Tuesday's horrific attacks. But we must also ask: Will it achieve the goal of eradicating bin Laden's networks and eliminating the terrorist threat to the United States? There are good reasons to suspect that it will not."

Klare told The Daily Collegian that conventional warfare "would not be the best way to put this terrorist operation out of business.

"Bin Laden and his supporters are too dispersed, too hidden," he said. "They will not be struck by bombs. We would be killing a lot of innocent Muslims."

Instead of attempting to bomb the members of the terrorist operation, Klare suggests that the US "brand them as the world's worst mass murderers," similar to the was in which the case of Slobodan Milosevic was handled.

"We should organize a man-hunt, rather than using the military," he said. "The terrorists will not be deterred by bombing Afghanistan. [That would be seen by them] as proof of the justice of their cause."

Klare derided the actions of President Bush and his cabinet, saying, "I think the administration has responded irresponsibly and opportunistically.

"Their first job should be to focus on the rescue operation – which," he notes, "they've done – but the most important parts have been done by New York City police and firemen. The second job is to take steps to prevent further attacks, and they've done a pretty good job of that."

But Klare disagrees with the way that Bush's administration has handled its "third job" – which, he says, is appropriate retaliation. "They've been seizing on peoples' anger to promote their own interests," he said, "which is very deplorable. They're going in the direction of an all-out military response that may not succeed."

Klare teaches a course on international security policy at the University of Massachusetts. He decided to significantly alter the topics covered in the course in order to address some of the issues raised by the attacks.

He maintains that reaction to his views has been mixed. His Salon article drew many responses, some highly positive, some highly negative.

In a letter to the editor of salon.com, a reader by the name of Bill Lindner wrote, "Nuking them A-rabs' is no answer, but let's not deceive ourselves about what this enemy – anarchy and terrorism – is willing to do. It will take a strong response in the only language they understand. Sadly, Professor Klare seeks 'peace in our time' with the monster of our moment."

"A lot of people are really angry with me," Klare said, "I think they feel that a police operation is not enough –that the violence against us was so great that we should respond in the same manner. But I don't think that killing more people is an appropriate response."

Greeks raise Relief funds

The Brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity and the Sisters of Sigma Delta Tau sorority held a car wash fundraiser yesterday. Proceeds were donated to the American Heroes Fund, a charity set up by Ahold USA, the parent company of the Stop and Shop supermarket chain. The Fund benefits the families of victims lost in the September 11 tragedy.

"It went really great, we raised around 748 dollars and change," Sigma Phi Epsilon brother John Moore, a senior Communications major said. "We're going to team up with Stop and Shop, and they said they'll match it. We had the American flag out there and people were honking their horns. We had people pulling up and giving us donations. One person pulled up and gave us a check for fifty dollars."

The event, held at Rafters Bar and Grill in Amherst, actually raised 886 dollars for the Fund, according to Sig Ep Brother Matthew Corwin. The Fund is one of many new charities that have sprung up in recent days as a reaction to the attacks.

"Stop & Shop takes great pride in our connection to the community," Marc Smith, President & CEO of Stop and Shop said in a released statement. "By launching the American Heroes Fund, we assist the disaster relief efforts in a meaningful way and show support for our nation in its time of need. Together, we will work to make a difference."

The event, explained Kara Slobin, a junior Communication Disorders major and Sigma Delta Tau sister, was a success.

"It was great, we raised a lot of money. Mostly it was for donations;

European unity subject in talk

By Joanna Zeitlin
Collegian Correspondent

Thomas Lindenberg, of the Center for Contemporary Historical Research in Potsdam, Germany, spoke last Thursday, Sept. 13, in Herter Hall. In his lecture, entitled "Rewriting Europe's History: Old Trajectories, New Discourses."

The event was scheduled to feature two speakers, but Chris Shore, the other speaker, was unable to attend due to the suspension of air travel following the terrorist attack on New York City on Sept. 11.

Lindenberg explained not only the new political and economic connection in the European Union, but also that there will also be a "move forward in social and cultural integration."

He described a new Europe with the new West and the old East finally coming together, united. The changes, according to Lindenberg, will bring together very different countries and force them to be compatible with one another.

"Europe," Lindenberg said, "will go through a complete and profound change."

He described two discourses on how to treat Europe in a more systematic way. First is the process of making countries and their people more alike. Because of widespread diversity not only in the East and the West, but also inside the individual countries, the European Union has to bridge the gap between their neighbors. Also, there will have to be a new look on the writing and rewriting of European history. Information must be collected from a more historical perspective, rather than a one-sided viewpoint. His second discourse pertained to the joining of the East and the West sides of Europe. Because of the huge religious and language barriers, a lot is a stake for the new European identity.

The new trajectories for Europe show a "continuous sight for infusion." Europe must now come together and find what the new Europe is going to be about, Lindenberg explained.

"To what extent does the society of the East share crucial elements of European identity?" He posed.

He added that there is a rigid line between the East and the West that needs to be crossed before they can be connected. Europe must overcome the stronghold of communism dictatorship and "take out the East and West dichotomy."

The integration of the eastern society with the rest of Europe is the beginning in creating a unified Union. Students attending the lecture responded to the issue and Lindenberg.

"It was interesting because I didn't know too much [about the European Union] before," sophomore Biology major Madeline Sheintaub said. "From across the ocean it doesn't seem like to big a deal."

In March of 1998 the 15 member states, Belgium, Germany, Greece, Spain, France, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Austria, Portugal, Finland, UK, Denmark, and Sweden, came together to form the European Union. This has led to political and economical ties within each country and created international trading and laws. Currently 12 more countries, Bulgaria, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, and Slovenia, are waiting to be added to the long list of the new European Union.

The Charter of Fundamental Rights links these countries together by instating a single statute for the civil, political, economic, social and societal rights of the people of the Union.

The second lecture of this series is being rescheduled for the middle of October.

Israel – After reports of the shooting death of an Israeli motorist, allegedly at the hands of Palestinians in Jerusalem last Saturday night, the Israeli government prepared early yesterday morning for an invasion of Ramallah, a West Bank city under Palestinian control.

As of yesterday, injuries were reported with no definite details surrounding the city's attack. However, the Israeli army was cited as saying "During the operation there were exchanges of fire between soldiers and Palestinians."

Shortly after the attack, it is believed the Israeli military pulled out of the city.

Conflicting reports about a fire fight last Friday night between the Israeli soldiers and Palestinian gunmen stationed near Ramallah left an cloud of mystery as to whether or not the Israelis previously invaded Area A, the name given to the Palestinian-controlled section of the West Bank, this week.

Palestinian security said the Israeli soldiers pulled out of Ramallah only after the army occupied a Palestinian National Security checkpoint in Area A, from which they were supposedly shooting.

The Israeli army denied the fact that they raid took the army into Area A but did admit there was an exchange of fire with Palestinian gunmen.

Despite all this, however news of peace talks between Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat sprung up.

It was reported Sharon claimed he would stop all Israeli-initiated actions of violence against Palestinian areas providing Arafat to would call at least a 48-hour cease fire in the Mideast at which time peace talks could ensue.

Great Britain – In light of Tuesday's attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, United Kingdom Prime Minister Tony Blair announced yesterday that the international community would fully support a fight against terrorism.

Upon being asked if he believed an actual war had been declared, Blair told reporters, "Whatever the technical or legal issues of that declaration of war, the fact is we are at war with terrorism. What happened on Tuesday was an attack not just upon the United States but upon the civilized world."

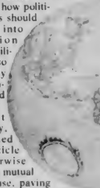
As the UK came to realize the high numbers of British citizens who were among the victims at the World Trade Center, anxieties escalated, placing into perspective that these attacks were not so far away from home after all.

"Probably two or three hundred people from Britain will have died in that terrorist attack," said Blair. "That makes it, in fact, the worst terrorist attack on British citizens that there has been since the Second World War."

Blair reported that, in his view, two key steps must be now taken, the first of which is a response to bring the responsible terrorists to account for Tuesday's destruction.

"Secondly," Blair noted, "there has then to be an agenda that we can strike at an international level that involves the whole of the international community in dismantling the machinery of international terrorism."

He questioned how terrorists finance their destructive acts and move about the world and as to which countries harbor terrorist cells and give them help, making sure to note that the UK will be there to help answer these questions.



Looking more towards their own home front, last Friday the UK began serious discussion on taking better precautions against airplane hijackings of their own, including having armed guards aboard planes and isolated cockpits for pilot protection.

"What we need to do is to respond to the things we saw on Tuesday," said British Transport Secretary Stephen Byers after a meeting of the EU transport ministers. "We need to mourn the dead, we have to protect the living, and we have to make sure our normal way of life is protected."

Germany – Germany's President, Johannes Rau, announced yesterday he does not anticipate German forces taking part in a military response to Tuesday's terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, yet agreed the people responsible for the US attacks should be found and brought to trial.

"My impression is that it [a military retaliation] is not called for, rather what is required is support of a logistic nature," Rau said during a radio interview. "This is an attack on the whole of civilization. Therefore, we must react with civil means."

In agreement, German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer remarked on how political responses should be taken into deliberation along with military action so that already ongoing conflicts would not worsen.

Last Wednesday, NATO called upon Article Five, otherwise known as its mutual defense clause, paving the way for a potential collective response to the terrorist acts by the alliance, Germany included.

German Defense Minister Rudolf Scharping reported the first official decisions about his country's involvement in a US military retaliation would be determined within the next few days.

Afghanistan – People of Afghanistan continued to flee their country yesterday in light of growing concern over a US-led attack in retaliation for Tuesday's terrorist assaults on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The country is bordered by Iran on its western border, by Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, and Tajikistan on the north, by Pakistan on the east and south, by China on a small portion of is northeast border.

Yesterday Iran, already home to about two million Afghan refugees who fled their country's warfare over the past 22 years, closed its borders to refugees after allowing an estimated 10,000 Afghans to enter their country in the past few days.

However, the Iranian government will continue to allow United Nations relief workers to cross the Afghanistan borders at spots where refugees are gathering in large masses in order to provide them with tents, water, and food.

Pakistan also recently closed its borders to Afghanistan, yet even with this official mandate, it is believed that people can still get through if they by-pass official checkpoints. Furthermore, Pakistani newspapers have reported the number of Afghan refugees has risen quite considerably over the past few days and has led to swelling of the already-packed refugee camps lining the border.

Japan – Fears that Asia may have its first case of mad cow disease escalated when an animal suspected of carrying the disease was processed into meat and bone meal even after the Japanese government had announced the animal had been slaughtered and burned in August.

Toshimichi Kado of the Agriculture Ministry in Tokyo reported that a meal plant and a feed mill in separate Japanese states were in possession of tons of meal suspect of deriving from a five-year-old milk cow believed to be diseased.

Bovine spongiform encephalopathy, more commonly know as mad cow disease, has already taken its toll on Europe's cattle industry this past year. Humans who eat meat from a diseased animal are believed to develop a fatal alternative case of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disorder.

Kado said miscommunication between the ministry officials and local authorities resulted in the original mistaken announcement decreeing the cow had been burned, yet made sure to mention that no other products containing the diseased meat and bone meal had been sold to customers.

According to Japanese news reports, the Agriculture Ministry issued an order for the contaminated meat to be destroyed this past Friday.

This week's plans set officials all over the country to begin inspecting 140,000 farms and 142 animal feed mills in search for any more indications of mad cow disease. As of yet, there have been no other reported cases.

Colombia – According to an army bulletin, five members of the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) were killed on Saturday in the provinces of Cundinamarca and Meta during an ongoing clash with the government.

In addition, two small bombs shattered storefronts in Cucuta, the capital of Norte de Santander. Both incidents related back to an ongoing series of terrorists attacks in the country.

Norte de Santander Police spokesman, William Herrera, claimed that in the beginning no one know who was responsible for the explosions in Cucuta. However, suspicions of FARC planting the explosions ran high due to a car bomb detonated last Friday night which is presumed to have been set by FARC. The blast ravaged homes and commercial buildings in Valledupar, the capital city of Cesar state.

The attack at Valledupar followed only two days after police in Arauca state deactivated another massive car bomb, also believed to be set by FARC.

In light of these disasters, the US State Department added a paramilitary army tnamed the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia) to its worldwide list of terrorist organizations. FARC, along with the smaller leftist National Liberation Army, appear on that list.

Italy – In Frosinone yesterday, Pope John Paul II offered his prayers to America and advised those affected by Tuesday's terrorist attacks to show self-control and commit themselves to peace before a congregation of 40,000 pilgrims during an open-air Mass.

As an American flag hung from an apartment building looking out onto the dense collection of people in remembrance of those who have suffered greatly from the recent attacks on the US, the Pope spoke out with words of hope.

"Mary welcomes the dead," he addressed, "consoles the survivors, supports those families who are particularly tried, and helps all to resist the temptation of hate and violence and to commit themselves to the service of justice and peace."

Security was made top priority during the Mass, the pontiff's 140th pastoral visit inside Italy since his papacy began in 1978. As such, roughly 4,000 law enforcement agents attended the event, and commercial flights over the city were banned while the Mass was being held.

Even with imminent security concerns, officials claim the Pope's approaching visit to Armenia and Kazakstan will be carried out as planned.

Australia – This past Friday, Air New Zealand temporarily suspended flights between Australia and New Zealand after the airline's directors came under heavy criticism from both country's governments for supervising what Australian deputy prime minister John Anderson called "a diabolical mess."

An investigation into the collapse of Australia's domestic airline, Ansett, has now begun. According to Australian Securities and Investments Commission chairman David Knott, it will focus on possible breaches of director's duties and investigate whether or not Ansett had traded while bankrupt, and if so, the possible liability of Ansett's owner, Air New Zealand.

The suspension of operations between the two continents left thousands of passengers stranded without flights to or from home and a staff of 16,000 people out of work unit further notice.

Last Friday, September 14th, a vigil was held on the lawn by the Campus Pond in honor of the National Day of Mourning declared by President Bush in honor of those killed in Tuesday's terrorist attacks. With classes cancelled in the national spirit of mourning, hundreds of students came to pay their respects.

leagues in the Congress and with President Bush to make sure that our country has the resources it needs to overcome this tragedy, and to bring those responsible to justice."

Representative Marty Meehan (D-MA), of the Fifth District, spoke out in support of a resolution that would allow military retaliation for Tuesday's attacks.

"I rise in support of the resolution before us to give our Commander in Chief and President the authority to use military action against these cowards who made such an unprecedented evil attack against the United States of America," Meehan said. "We must respond to terrorism and respond swiftly, not only to the terrorists, but as the President so accurately said, to anyone who would harbor terrorists anywhere in the world, whether they be countries or individuals."

Richard Neal (D-MA), who represents the Second Congressional District, explained that right now, partisan politics should not get in the way of dealing with terrorists.

"Let me state unequivocally, that I fully support President George W. Bush during this national crisis. At this grave moment in our nation's history, it essential that all Americans stand together in firm support of our Commander-in-Chief," Neal said in a released statement. "In what represents the most serious act of aggression on American soil, a nameless and faceless enemy launched an assault on the very foundation of our society. Throughout this tragedy, President Bush has demonstrated effective leadership, and has been a reassuring figure to the American people."

Congressman John Olver (D-MA), who represents Massachusetts' First District, explained that our national security, then justice, should be our priorities.

"We must mete out punishment for the perpetrators of this attack. Our response must be decisive, but carefully calculated. One critical goal of American foreign policy must be to mobilize other nations to crack down on terrorism with new determination.," Olver said in a released statement.

people didn't even have their cars washed. We raised around seven or eight hundred hundred dollars, and supposedly Stop and Shop is going to match that," Skobin said. "There were probably 45 people there helping out and tons of people getting their cars washed."

The Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity suffered along with the nation in the attacks. Brother Daniel Afflitto died in the collapse at the World Trade Center. Afflitto was employed by Cantor, Fitzgerald on the 104th floor of one of the towers. Brother Chris Larabee is reported to be missing in the South Tower collapse.

"Our brothers all over the country mourn them," Moore said. "Our hearts are with them and their families."

A call to arms:
World responds to attacks

The attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon last Tuesday were initially referred to as acts of war, events that would be aggressively responded to by the United States.

Six days later that call to arms has inched to the brink of becoming a reality.

Vice President Dick Cheney warned yesterday that any nations sheltering Osama bin Laden will face the "full wrath of the United States," singling out Afghanistan as the most likely target to find the exiled bin Laden.

Also reported yesterday was that a delegation of senior Pakistani officials will travel to Afghanistan on Monday to tell the Taliban to hand over bin Laden to the United States, giving them a three-day frame in which to comply. If that demand is not met, a massive retaliatory threat has been given.

In response to the demand for bin Laden, the spiritual leader of the Taliban has said that there are no plans to hand over the terrorist and that he will declare a holy war on any nation supporting the US in this decision to serve justice.

The decision by the US to allow three days for the emergence of bin Laden is a strained but necessary decision; an impossibly short amount of time that will seem decidedly drawn out as both sides negotiate and wait. The unease this country has felt for nearly a week now will be concentrated into a period of time half that, as we sit and wait, wondering who will make the next move, what it will be, and how the decision will affect the course of our lives.

In addition to the promise of aggressive force if necessary, the Bush administration has also announced that it will seek expanded legal powers to fight terrorism at home and internationally. Cheney said this effort will require "mean, dirty" intelligence tactics not currently allowed, while President Bush has asked all Americans to return to work on Monday and proceed, as much as possible, on with our lives.

This pledge on the part of our government, that has not only promised to seek and serve justice but has also come to our emotional defense, should be taken in the best light, across all political lines as someone acting in our best interest. Regardless of your opinions regarding the politics and policies of George W. Bush and his staff, this is no time to be overly critical or examining his faults.

This process will be easy for no one. All of us are in this together, and the best we can do is put our support behind the one who makes the decisions, praying that they are the right ones.

Stuck in a moment:
A day that will forever be with all of us

KEN CAMPBELL

I hope when my children hear about America's worst day, the textbooks and teachers will be referring to this, because this is hard enough to explain to them.

I can't imagine anything being harder.

That day, off in the future, when my children ask me where I was when the sky fell, I'll hand them a copy of the Collegian from that day, and tell them, "Daddy was a reporter."

Not a student reporter.

Not a reporter for a college paper.

Just a reporter, with no modifiers.

Reporters aren't supposed to feel. My friend Melissa put it best when she said our position doesn't allow us to express our opinions, and that's the only thing that saved me. Being able to not feel, to not contemplate the sheer fact that thousands of Americans have been blinked out of existence was best. It was shock, pure and simple.

but having a goal, a story to complete, a fellow writer to argue with, let me think about other things. My mind wasn't in New York, amidst the pile of rubble that had been the World Trade Center Towers. My mind was in the Campus Center Basement, and although I talked to frightened and stressed people in Boston, New York, Arlington, and Washington DC, I was in the Joe Friday/reporter mode. Just the facts.

But although we are not supposed to feel, one of the drawbacks to being a reporter is that you are human, and you do feel. So once my story, my task, my goal, was finished I was left with nothing but the reality that Americans were dead at the hands of terrorists.

I still didn't believe it. I'm not sure I do now, almost a week later. I felt like I was living through a Tom Clancy novel, or that at anytime I would wake up and it would be over, I'd go to class, and everything would be alright.

It shocking to feel the effects of terrorism. We have for so long been protected by two oceans and have been lulled into thinking that we can't be touched. Well, we're touchable. And that's what terrorism is. It's a war unlike any other. For so long I have thought about terrorism in a strange way. The Ulster Defense Force were terrorists, the IRA were soldiers. To me, before 9-11, terrorists were the bad guys. Now I realize that anyone who tries to influence government policy through – and this is the crucial part – illegal acts of violence is wrong. The IRA, as much as I support their ideological beliefs, are terrorists just as much as the UDF.

Bin Laden and his cronies have a beef with the US for some reason. OK, he's got a right to his opinion. Just as whoever – and I'm not saying it is him, but all signs are pointing that way – crashed the planes had a right to theirs. And I'm not talking US Constitution, I'm talking basic human rights. What they did not have the right to do is kill people.

This attack has been described as the second Pearl Harbor. That's a wrong estimation. Pearl Harbor was a military installation, attacked by the military might of a sovereign nation. This was an attack on civilians by civilians. This is mass murder. And, if, as is coming to light, it was conducted in the name of God, then I don't know what to do.

So now terror is the official enemy of the United States, and we'll be combating it in a long drawn out campaign designed to do shatter the networks of terror. We must not "retaliate". Revenge is not the key here. We must, however, exact justice. If we kill innocents, we are no better than terrorists. Turning the other cheek will not do in this case. Those responsible and those hiding them have declared war not only on the United States but on the spirit of democracy and human decency. But our response should be just and well measured, else we fall into the same despicable category as our enemies.

> "We must remember that there will always be a tomorrow. There will be a future, and the course of action that we choose today will shape the way that future is going to be."

To preserve our peace, we must, as the quote goes, prepare for war. The form that war will take has yet to be defined. Nobody has ever declared war on one man, or a handful of people.

I hope that in this wave of patriotism, we remember that those that came before us died so that we could ALL be free. And that goes for anybody visiting our country. Don't blame your neighbors because they speak with an accent or "look" a certain way. Don't turn against one another. If someone has a different opinion, they can express it, and we should all listen. Although you may not share that opinion, if we silence them we sully the honorable deaths of the heroes and innocents with a dark stain of intolerance.

We must remember that there will always be a tomorrow. There will be a future, and the course of action that we choose today will shape the way that future is going to be.

I do want to think about the future. Last week has been described as the worst day in American history and I hope it is. I remember a few other days as the worst in American history. The first one came in 1986, when the Challenger exploded in front of me and the rest of my first grade class. The next came years later, when a bomb shook the World Trade Center. Then a bomb ripped through the Federal Building in Oklahoma City. Then there was an attack on United States embassies. Then came an attack against a naval ship, the Cole.

All of them were described as the worst day in American history. I pray that this latest attack, with its death toll in the thousands, is the WORST. That there will be no more days where the entire nation mourns, and a world where there will be no terror.

I hope I can look back on this dark time, and that when my kids look up at after reading the yellowed, dry issue from September 12, that we all realize how truly wonderful this country and this people are. The generosity and outpouring of relief from all sectors has proven that we can make it through this time and any other crisis. We are resolute. We are stubborn. We do not give up. We are Americans.

Will an act of war spur us to defend liberal democracy?

GEORGE THOMAS

From the top of DuBois Library, I want to unfurl a huge American flag and ask the hip post- intellectuals if they really believe in cultural relativism. If they can tell me, with a straight face, that Islamic fundamentalism is really equal to, just different from, America's liberal constitutionalism. No, this won't do, because, despite their belief in cultural relativism, so many intellectuals disdain the cultural values of the West while trumpeting those of the "oppressed."

"Don't you know," I want to shout at them, "that in such cultures you'd simply be crushed? They have no tolerance for you!" And yet, in the confines of our own academic community, I must listen to some professors and students tell me that, all things considered, America had it coming; that, when considered from a distance, we've done the same many times – if not worse. How can we complain? To this, I want to scream: "Why don't you leave?" America, unlike so many cultures around the world that are morally superior, has open borders. Just how is it that they live in America if they find it so morally repugnant? But this is an intemperate response, and as a partisan of liberal democracy, I believe in moderation. So let me begin again, let me begin, in the midst of this chaos, on a note of hope.

I hope that the act of war against the United States might have one beneficial result: it may lead us to once again defend liberal democracy – and even America itself – with an honest conviction that does not shrink from intellectual smirks, or the ironic distance that passes for profundity in the academy. Liberal democracy is rarely defended in our cramped intellectual confines, and Worse, we hear empathy for these groups as the "oppressed," while America is the great "oppressor." We've grown so morally obtuse that we hesitate in the face of such arguments.

Indulge me in a bit of patriotism. Let us recall Lincoln's beautiful words from the Gettysburg Address to help us remember why liberal democracy is worth defending: "...that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain – that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom – and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

I readily confess that America has its share of problems and has had them throughout our history – some of which we can only described as evil. We know the litany – so much grist for the academy's mill – so I need not recite it here. Still, America, imperfect as it is – and it is surely that – has offered the average person a better life than any nation in history. The urbane, of course, will smile ironically at such a quaint notion. I will only say that in so many instances, America itself, in the long run with Americans turning to our own core values, has recognized its injustices and paved the way against them. Take a single example. When Americans of Japanese ancestry were put into camps during World War II, many fellow Americans considered it a betrayal of American principles – and it surely was. (A point we'd do well to remember with Arab and Islamic Americans now.) Fred Korematsu, an American living on the West Coast, was ordered to a relocation center. Claiming the full rights of American citizenship, he had the courage to take his battle all the way to the Supreme Court. Sadly, he lost. But that was not the end of the matter. The conservative Supreme Court justice Owen Roberts, writing in dissent, called it a clear violation of constitutional rights. Another dissenting justice called it what it was: quite simply, an act of racism.

Looking back, it is the dissenting opinions that America celebrates, while condemning the action itself. This is wonderfully symbolic in that our dissenting voices often represents what is best in America: those who made us look in the mirror at our shortcomings and see that we were not living up to our own principles are often lionized as American heroes. Years later, though it was too little too late, America officially apologized for its act and paid reparations to the victims.

This is one of the great virtues of liberal democracy and one, unfortunately, that far too many intellectuals living under liberal democracy take for granted. It is odd that so many in the intellectual community, who clearly loathe America, and equally hate liberal democracy, make America their home. And it is telling. I'm not suggesting that we shouldn't criticize America. "Love it or leave it" is unacceptable. No, I'm speaking of those who hate America, who speak of Amerika, as if liberalism is the moral equivalent of fascism, as if we are no better than Nazi Germany.

Such intellectuals, however, seem to have no problem taking money from our immoral nation, or letting the state subsidize their tuition bills. Perhaps their critiques aren't meant to be taken too seriously: the equivalent of mental masturbation, they can theorize all they'd like, spinning out radical critiques of liberalism, smugly laughing at the notion of a right to free speech, while all the while they live – peacefully and comfortably – under these very protections. They are never bothered by any real hardship, like being locked up for their speech, or tortured for their political views, or even denied tax payer dollars so they may comfortably continue their disdain of American liberalism. So long, that is, as they continue to live in a rich and tolerant land like America.

Maybe we've been too tolerant. Surely we've been too tolerant in a policy that dispenses millions of dollars a year to those who hate us, to those who figuratively danced on the graves of innocent Americans. At least let us have the courage to stop giving our wealth to those who would willingly use it against us. And let us, for God's sake, stop apologizing for our beliefs. Even postmodern academics who sell cultural relativism are smart enough, underneath it all, to prefer America and its way of life to the alternatives.

Television Unites

By Nikolas Markantonatos
Collegian Staff

TV moments come and go, blurring into the ever-changing broadcast of our viewing experience. But in our mind's eye, if not our physical one, some shine brighter than others. Some of them forever influence or change the medium. Some draw us together as a nation.

Some are cool or funny enough that when we remember that moment a deep memory is called upon and we know exactly what we were doing at that time period. Some contain such powerful effects of shocking images that forever move us.

Most of these moments have occurred during our parents and grandparents' generations. Neil Armstrong walks on the moon; Michael Jackson moonwalks; J.R. is shot on "Dallas." But we have had a few as well. News coverage of the Gulf War; "Seinfeld" signs off the air; JFK Jr.'s fatal plane crash.

But it is national tragedies that have had a legacy like no other on the television. They convey shocking images pilfering our collective consciousness, numbing the body and creating an environment of deep care and thought.

Most noteworthy, President John F. Kennedy's death and funeral transfixed a nation and forever changed the way we regard TV. His death on Nov. 22, 1963 ranks as the greatest moment in TV history. It was that week that a grappling nation sat watching events unfold and drew America together.

Similarly, last week's tragedy brought together a mourning nation. The surreal, near-apocalyptic scenes of Tuesday's catastrophe were broadcast along with continuous news coverage to try to explain the unexplainable.

The event will live as one of the greatest TV moments, as America watched the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center in New York City collapse and a chunk of the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. destroyed. The deplorable tragedy of Sept. 11 will undoubtedly remain forever etched in our collective minds. The painful images of two planes ramming into, and eventually collapsing, the Towers, the heavy cloud forming in the Manhattan skyline, a reduced Pentagon and fleeting, chaotic scenes of New Yorkers are visions that will persist.

The people most immediately affected by the disaster were incorporating television into their response: President George W. Bush, to establish that American power will prevail, and family members of the deceased victims, to demonstrate the horrible loss.

Television remains the supreme source for information, above print as an immediate news source, and even above the Internet, as it creates a focal point for the public's grief.

In times like these, TV is not only legitimate, but necessary. We look to the quasi-editorial anchors of Dan Rather, Peter Jennings, and Tom Brokaw to tell us everything will be okay in times of crisis. We have again turned to them as network cameras caught, and continue to reel, nearly every tremor of tragedy in New York and Washington, D.C. They bring us the very latest with a tremble in their visage as they relay official announcements of demise and frantic scenes. In times of disaster, we turn to them to hear that everything will be all right. Simply put, we are a TV nation.

A vast amount of Americans were, of course, fixated on their television sets Tuesday night as some 60 million people tuned into the major network for news coverage surrounding the devastating terrorist attacks. Viewing levels peaked between 8:30 and 9 pm when President Bush addressed the nation. And that 60 million figure doesn't include the millions glued to cable channels such as CNN, MSNBC, and Fox News. Reportedly, 75 percent of all TV viewers were watching one of the broadcast nets– an extraordinary number by any measure. With a growing array of cable television networks continuously springing new television series, Americans decided to instead tune into the unfolding events of the tragedy– an event that hasn't happened in at least a decade since the Gulf War.

Even more commendable is TV news industry's cooperative and non-competitive spirit where all networks decided to share all footage on Tuesday. The story and viewer interest has been placed first. Equally praiseworthy is the network's refrain (at least so far) from trumpeting their ratings or noting their competitors' failings.

This is what makes the television medium so rich– its vivid, up-to-the-minute coverage, its unifying supremacy, and its power to provoke, to remind, and to engage. The aftermath in this case has yet to unfold but we know that we can rely on TV to not only inform us on the latest developments but to also offer consolation.

Tragedy's effects are felt in movies, TV

By Nicholas Pizzolato
Collegian Staff

Tuesday's horrendous events were described to many as being something right out of the movies. We had never seen anything like it. Or had we? From True Lies to Independence Day, American moviegoers have sadly witnessed the destruction of national landmarks and have brushed them off in sick twist of entertainment and astonishment. To no one's surprise, upcoming movies have been postponed, and over the weekend primetime movies were bumped.

Arnold Schwarzenegger's upcoming film Collateral Damage, which deals with the bombing of a Los Angeles tower by a terrorist, has been "indefinitely" shelved according to Warner Bros. studios. Scheduled for an Oct. 5 release date, the future of the last action hero's latest film is to be announced. Along with the delayed release of the film, Warner Bros. pulled commercials, posters and ads for the action flick, and also shut down the film's website, which featured phony newspaper headlines about the fraudulent attack.

Touchstone Pictures (a subsidiary of Disney Pictures) has postponed the Tim Allen comedy Big Trouble because of one scene that involves a plane carrying a bomb. Set to debut this upcoming Friday, Sept. 21, it is unknown when this ensemble comedy, which also stars MTV's Johnny Knoxville (from Jackass) and the stoic comedian John Warburton (Putty from Seinfeld) among others, will end up being premiered.

Sam Raimi's superhero film Spider Man, starring Toby McGuire as Peter Parker, also ran into some problems after Tuesday's attack. Sony Pictures pulled trailers from the Internet and movie theaters. The trailer features a sequence which has the Marvel Comic star capturing a helicopter filled with bank thieves in a spider web which he constructed between the World Trade Center towers. The scene does not appear in the film, which premieres May 3, but for the immediate future the sequence has been sent back to the studio for retooling.

This past weekend, two networks pulled three movies due to the tragedy. ABC pulled the Dreamworks picture The Peacemaker which conclusion had a terrorist with an atomic weapon near the U.N. ABC replaced it with the film Hope Floats. Fox replaced The X-Files Friday night, which opens with a bomb scare and detonation of a government building in Texas, with Nine Months. On Sunday, the science fiction movie Independence Day, which shows a race of malevolent aliens destroying national icons in New York, Washington, and L.A. with the film Mrs. Doubtfire. However, the movies were pre-empted with special news coverage from both FOX and ABC.

The FOX conspiracy drama/comedy The Lone Gunmen featured an episode toward the end of last spring, which had the government plan an attack on the World Trade Center and blame it on terrorists, in order to acquire money for a defense plan. The heroes of the show were able to stop the plan and miss the building by a matter of inches.

However, in a rather surprising programming note, TBS will be showing classic World War Two movies and visiting war time monuments as a part of the movie themed show Movies for Guys who like Movies.

This is not the first time that television episodes and movies have been delayed, pulled, postponed or even canceled due to contemporary events. After the Oklahoma City bombing, The New Muppet Show did not show an episode in which Sandra Bullock joined the cast in a Speed parody. That episode was later shown during the shows short-lived rebroadcast on the Disney Channel. After the Columbine High School shooting, the producers of Buffy: The Vampire Slayer delayed an episode in which graduating high school students fought a monster. During the same time the film Killing Mrs. Tingle was not only shelved until mid-summer but also changed it's name to Teaching Mrs. Tingle.

Outdoor art at Smith delights old and young alike

Paradise Gate sculpture at Smith.

Walking up to Paradise Gate, it's hard to believe that it's real. At first, I thought there must be some metal skeleton, supporting it, or that it was made of painted walls. But upon a closer examination, I realized that this massive structure was held up by nothing but the saplings that make up the whole.

The beauty of the work is not in the human touch shaping nature, like the art of gardens work. This beauty lies in the fact that Paradise Gate looks like it was made entirely without human intervention. It looks like it has grown up from the ground, like a strange tree. Or that particularly large and architecturally savvy birds have constructed it, and then let the wind sculpt it.

But this is the work of a man. Artist Patrick Dougherty's creation hides behind Smith College's Neilson Library, inviting all those who pass by it to come in and take a look.

Dougherty is no stranger to working with saplings. He created his first sculpture in 1982. Since then he has been making these site-specific works internationally, both indoors and out.

The artist spent about three weeks in residency at Smith, starting this past March. First, he worked at gathering the materials and then planning the structure. Then he, and a group of volunteers that grew bigger by the day, worked at the construction. The sculpture was completed in April.

All in all, the work used 15 truckloads of wood. The saplings were gathered locally. Residents and parks offered up their materials for the installation.

Although Dougherty has also made giant abstract forms in this manner, Paradise Gate, like some of his more recent work, references architecture. The building that it calls to mind, however, may not exist in time and space.

It is a fairy-tale castle made from transient materials. The very nature of it is ethereal. But, the strange nature of the work is immediately overcome by its inviting nature. All of the doors and entranceways beg you to come inside and take a look.

Once inside, after exploring each domed tower and the central "room," you don't want to leave. Each tower, though ostensibly similar, is actually different. Some have more doorways, one has large oval windows near to the ground, and another has windows above that act as portals to the sky. These differences again make you believe that this has been naturally formed.

Watching children run inside the sculpture and out again, or resting in one of its towers, or hiding from each other behind the walls, made it yet more difficult to not be enchanted by this work.

The flowers that twist around the branches, the new leaves that have sprung from the tower tops, and the light that streams in, like stained glass in a more casual cathedral, belie the human touch in its creation.

Paradise Gate is a combination of arts that can be intimately experienced. It combines the natural charm of the garden, with the more rigid form of architecture. The result is unlike anything that I have ever seen.

It is structure that looks like it was taken from the imagination of a child, or sprung up from the ground to remind its visitors that they were once children.

Paradise Gate will remain on the grounds of Smith, on Burton Lawn, until next April. And now, while the Valley enters its most beautiful season, is the perfect opportunity to go see this captivating sculpture.

Corelli's unconvincing tale of love falls completely flat

By Jake D. Lewis

Captain Corelli's Mandolin
Directed by John Madden
Starring Nicolas Cage and Penelope Cruz
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Even though I may not fully agree with the result of Shakespeare In Love being awarded Best Picture at the Oscars in 1998, I feel it was nonetheless a brilliant movie, in all aspects. The director of that film, John Madden, is hoping to cash in and strike gold twice it seems, with his latest gooey love story Captain Corelli's Mandolin. But he drops the ball here, not even giving us a note of the amazement that was Shakespeare In Love.

In the role of Corelli is Nicolas Cage, who practices a rather dangerous career technique of choosing to do movies based on who is directing them. How else can you explain Snake Eyes and Bringing Out the Dead? Hoping to recapture some of the fame that was given him in his head-turning role in Leaving Las Vegas, Cage again suffers a mighty blow, as this is just another example of a poor film made by a superb director.

Corelli is an Italian commander who is stationed on a remote Greek island during WWII. It's there that he falls in love with Pelagia (Penelope Cruz), who, of course, is already engaged to Mandras (Christian Bale), a fisherman who has gone off to fight. Corelli is the enemy of Pelagia, but his calm demeanor and love for music somehow wins her over. Amidst all of this is the bombing and bloodshed that is a wartime movie.

Even though Cage is Italian, his accent is unconvincing, switching back and forth between Italian, Russian and a combination of every other European dialect. He comes across as a cartoon character, whereas his intention is to be suave and romantic. Instead he sounds like he's fresh off the boat after only taking a few English classes at the community college back home in Italy. It's hard to take Cage seriously in any scenes where he talks, most of which are with Cruz. At least she has an authentic accent, even though she

Preston explores sounds, styles in music

By Sam Wilkinson

Preston School of Industry
All of This Sounds Gas
Matador Records

Spiral Stairs' Preston School of Industry unapologetically offers listeners a pastiche of sound then leaves them to figure it all out. Stairs, who had previously been a band member of Steven Malkmus in Pavement, seems unable, and unwilling, to define himself by genre, instead grabbing from here and there until his final product can't be labeled.

That's bad for critics; it's great for his new band's first album, All of This Sounds Gas. Stairs' songs combine country and reverb, soft guitars and feedback. Stairs unwillingness to lash his band together by traditional means leaves of collection of songs that could have been recorded by BR-549, Depeche Mode, or Tripping Daisy.

While Pavement was roundly praised for its pop sound, or at least, its straight out of the garage pop sound, Preston's accomplishment is its polished indifference towards conventional definition. Stair's treal name, Scott Kannberg albums is also different in another way. he has truly created an album that is more emotive musically than lyrically. Too often, artists bog down their albums with trite vocals meant, presumably, to change our lives; Stairs doesn't seem to care his sung words at all, letting his music tell the story while his nonsensical lyrics fade into the background.

That said, some of his strangely titled songs are simply amazing. "monkey heart and the horses' leg" is unbelievable, using an ebbing and flowing guitar lick to vaguely reference the constant change of life. With almost indecipherable lyrics (the sheet in the album presents all lyrics in single, unpunctuated paragraphs, furthering the idea that Stairs could really care less about them), "monkey heart" is a simple guitar ballad, electrified. And Stairs subtle mix of cello on the flows on "monkey," the points of the song at which the music is most emotive, is inspired. No song more grabs the listener's attention than does this "monkey heart."

Of course, for as simple and beautiful as the ninth track is, the third track is country as country can be. On "a treasure @ silver bank (this dynasty's for real)" a steel guitar, a cowbell in the distant background, choir like back ground vocals, and a simple guitar riff is all Stairs needs to sing of his missed home. In fact, none of the lyrics come together save the most audible ones "I'm stuck here, looking straight back at home." The rest of his vocals are muddled and confused, hastily delivered and blending togeiher like crayons colors that become brown when combined. When he starkly speaks of his home, he is clear and crisp. He doesn't want you to hear brown; he wants you to hear his nostalgia.

There are other standouts as well. "Solitaire" is all over the map. Sounding like a single from the one-hit wonder "Tripping Daisy," Stairs' total randomness on the song – 50's background singing and ska horns? – musically, and his barely delivered lyrics somehow come together at the end of the song to make the listener appreciative. At more than seven minutes, "encyclopedic knowledge of" is Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers with more reverb.

The greatest danger of Preston's style is the possibility that Stairs' stew of style will get too out there, too messed up, too convoluted. It gets close. All of This Sounds Gas frequently sounds like a project where Kannberg and some friends came together to make an album for themselves, like they explored some of the themes that interested them and happened to record it for commercial release. That was a fortunate decision for us. The decidedly offbeat impression left by the album blends perfectly with its decidedly polished exploration of influence.

Stairs might not care what listeners think, but if he keeps releasing albums as steeped in explorative quality as "All of This" is, he won't have to worry about us anyway. They'll be satisfied.

sometimes speak too fast to catch all of what she's saying (although, that may be due to my old age). We can perfectly understand everything Cage says, but it just sounds stupid as it spews forth from his lips.

Music is what inevitably brings Corelli and Pelagia together, but it takes too long to do it. Music is lifeblood for Corelli; it's one of the only things that make sense to him in the war, but Pelagia really expresses no interest in the art form. In fact, she is more attracted to the sciences as she prepares to follow in her father's footsteps of being a doctor. It's hard to believe that Pelagia falls in love with Corelli after hearing him play only one song on his mandolin, more than halfway through the movie. Until this point she has bitterly despised Corelli, which is far more convincing than the romance that soon evolves.

The film spends no time on the development of their relationship, plunging head first into true love. It is hollow and unfounded, which makes the characters far less likeable. The most realistic character is that of Madras, played by the underrated Christian Bale. His performance of being in love is by far the most convincing, and when he is pitted for Corelli, one wants to say to him, "you're better off without her." It is just another example of how the love story is out of proportion, concentrated more on what the audience knows is a lost cause.

There are very few scenes of war, which leaves a lot of pretty scenery and bland stars in its place. The violent moments are generally unnecessary, especially when a young girl is hanged from a tree for what appears to have nothing to do with the story.

Keanu Reeves' Hardball earned 10.1 million, becoming number 1 at the box office. At the end of the movie Corelli is betrayed and set up to die in front of a firing squad. One of his soldiers protects him from being shot and it's one of the film's few powerful moments. It's soon ruined by a trite circumstance that turns the ending into a far more drawn out and gimmicky one than we would have hoped.

On paper, Captain Corelli's Mandolin might have seemed like a good idea, but all the separate factors do not come together for a successful composition. Captain Corelli's Mandolin plays way off key.

Broken Ryde

The Matches postponed due to U.S. tragedy

It would have been a long three days of golf, spoiled.

Had the 34th edition of The Ryder Cup gone on as scheduled this month at The Belfry in England, its surrounding spectacle would have been flawed.

Last time (October 1999), Justin Leonard rolled in a 45-foot birdie putt on the 17th hole of The Country Club to secure both the Cup (for the first time since 1993) and the greatest comeback in Ryder Cup history to the United States.

ERIC SODERSTROM

It was perhaps one of the most exciting sports moments in this country's history. When Leonard's ball hit the bottom of the cup on that edgy autumn day, golf fans this side of the Atlantic went mad.

Sure, the gala may have been in excess. But, to many, it didn't matter at that point.

Really, it was more than just golf. It was more than just a hearty rivalry. To many it was America vs. Europe.

Us vs. them. And we won.

As Leonard's teammates rushed the green to laud him for his accomplishment, Jose Maria Olazabal, Leonard's opponent on that final day, shook his head in well-merited spite. Olazabal still was faced with a putt that could have stalled the outcome for at least another hole. But when the green was finally erased of lunacy, the Spaniard missed, and the American crowd returned to cheer.

The actions of the American squad that day will never be forgotten. Not now, not tomorrow, and not next September when The Ryder Cup Matches have been scheduled to resume.

But that's just sports. And when it comes as big as that little Ryder Cup, even golf's sacred rules of decorum can become disbanded for a few moments.

The European golf world is irritated with this nation, and for good reason. We have the Cup, and they don't. But that's why this year's Matches were going to be such great fun.

The tension had been heightened.

The fans in England were going to heckle Tiger Woods to the same degree that our fans jeered Colin Montgomerie in Brookline. They were going to turn the decibel levels up on all reactions to European successes and American follies.

They were going to try and teach Americans a lesson; that it's terribly difficult to win on foreign soil, especially when you're not welcome.

But sure enough, they were also going to enjoy one of the greatest events in sports, and at the same time, respect the game and its players.

And when the outcome was finally determined, the side at loss would shed tears, while the victorious party would explode bottles of champagne into the British sky.

That's The Ryder Cup.

This year, captivation was rooted in the United States' attempt to weather all conditions in a hostile environment. That's what was on the playbill. Both sides knew it. And both sides were ready to act it out.

But after the nation's terror attacks Tuesday, sports have been thrust to the wayside. There's no possible way that our players could harness the emotions needed to compete in this event. It's not fair to ask them to.

That's why the European Ryder Cup board made the right decision Sunday, for postponement.

Hopefully next year, Tuesday's tragedy will be a relative distant memory for both sides, and the games will go on – as competitive as ever.

This decision wasn't based entirely on concerns for safety. It was made so the greatest Matches in golf won't be played at a time when they just don't want to be played. No one could of expected this.

Now, it is just golf.

Now, it is just a simple game.

And right now, it can wait.

minds of these women.

"We were just ready to go and we're starting to get back in the groove of things," said UMass captain, defender Sarah Cook. "It was just a relief to go out and take our minds off of it for a little bit."

While the Minutewomen's performance and the result will surely bring smiles to the faces to the team and its fans, those smiles will be masking a deeper pain.

"We wanted this to be a meaningful thing for us and not just show up and play," said Coach Rudy. "We certainly didn't play for fun today. This wasn't for fun, this was a statement that we enjoy freedom in this country."

Life must carry on and life will carry on both here at UMass and throughout America. Sunday's game was just a step in returning us to where we were before Tuesday's attack.

"It was good to just get out and play," said Leighman. "One of the things about the American spirit is that we get knocked down, but we get back up, and I think it's important to get back up. I think that if we don't get back up than the people who have done this and perpetrated this have beaten us. They haven't just attacked buildings; they've attacked the American spirit. And we can't let that happen."

■ Santos

The three goals gave No. 17 four on the year, with the first one coming in her first regular season collegiate game, a double-overtime win over cross-state rival Boston College.

That opening night goal was preceded by Santos's selection onto the A-10 All-Rookie Team alongside teammate and fellow forward, Erica Wideberg.

The preseason accolades and the BC goal warmed everyone up to the name, but after Sunday's brilliant performance, any Maroon and White soccer fan will now associate the name Stephanie Santos with a dominating force on the pitch.

■ soccer

BU fought to get the ball out of its defensive third, but Cook and the rest of the Minutewoman defense refused to let the ball cross midfield.

At 58:26, Santos completed the hat trick, rooting the ball from inside the box, giving the Maroon and White a comfortable 4-0 lead.

Mere minutes later, Santos's domination frustrated the BU defense, which led to a forearm that awarded UMass a penalty kick. Senior Kathleen Machamer was called on to take the shot. The Colorado native drilled the ball into the bottom-left portion of the net, but Cherry guessed right in the goal and made a terrific diving save.

Nigh kept shutout hopes alive with a nice diving save on a shot by a wide-open Tansa Wonk.

The zero was lifted from the scoreboard, however, on a miscue on a corner kick. Junior Bearcat Tracey Anderson sent the ball high and directly at Nigh on the near side of the goal. The keeper did a nice job of getting to the ball, but had it smack off her hands and bounce right into the goal at 78:56.

Freshman defender Carly Turman put the game out of reach, 5-1, at 87:12. The Pleasant Hill, Calif. native got control of the ball in traffic and drilled it past Cherry into the goal.

Katelyn Jones put the final nail in BU's coffin on a breakaway a minute later off a nifty assist from Wideberg on the outside that allowed Jones to score.

"Wideberg [had] a great assist," Rudy said. "That was really classy and very unselfish. Hopefully that is a sign that our freshman have picked into our team spirit that it doesn't matter who does it as long as somebody does it."

Binghamton captain Merri Monenare dropped a ball over Nigh's head and into the goal from 15 yards out with just five seconds left, making the final score 6-2.

After a tough 5-0 loss to the University of Connecticut on September 5th at home, UMass was finally able to defend its home turf again, and earned its first home victory of the season.

"It was good to get a home win," Cook said. "And to beat a team [convincingly] is always good, too."

With restored confidence, the Minutewomen will have a week to prepare for their next match up against Rhode Island at Totman on Sunday afternoon.

Madden 2002 is a well-oiled machine

By Anthony Mignogna
The Pitt News (U. Pittsburgh)

(U-WIRE) PITTSBURGH - Just when you think the Madden series could not get any better, EA Sports somehow finds a way to improve upon its tradition of excellence with this year's edition of "Madden 2002." The improvements and features added are endless, and for those of you Madden fanatics who have already played the game, you understand.

The game play itself is even more realistic than ever before with new player animations, two-handed catches and enhanced blocking and tackling schemes, which take into account the player's talent and size.

Tiburon, the designers for EA Sports, used a method called facial mapping to form an exact replica of the real-life players and coaches. From blinking eyes to moving lips, the emotions and drama become real. Even the equipment was taken into account. For example, Steelers corner, Hank Poteat, comes complete with gloves and armbands.

The defensive effects have also been slightly tweaked. The linebackers and defensive backs react to offensive sets in addition to pass coverage, which does not allow a touchdown for every big pass play. Last year, the defense would just stand and watch the receiver catch the ball rather than try to knock it down. Luckily, that has changed, allowing for more realistic experiences and scores.

Probably the biggest improvements from games of the past are the automatic instant replays. Game-breaking catches and hits are shown three times, each from a different angle. This is especially fun to watch during a sack when the quarterback's head is jolted back with the sound of grunting and cracking of pads as he hits the turf.

Aside from the game play and graphics, a few modes have also been enhanced. Developers have put in a feature that allows you to draft players onto a team that you personally design. Everything is personalized, from the uniforms to the stadium where they play. Also, there is now a two-minute drill mode where you can earn points on both offense and defense just like at real NFL training camps.

As always, John Madden is back in the booth. Although some of his comments are not always insightful, they are a part of the Madden tradition that you can live with. That tradition has held up again this year. The realism and features are unmatched, making "Madden 2002" the best football game to date.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) –Fear of the unknown may keep you from enjoying the familiar today. This is a good time to address those haunting concerns.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – This is a good day to encourage friends and family members to band together for a common cause. You know what to fight for!
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – This is a good day to lie low and keep a close eye on those who insist on being at the center of activity. You'll learn important dos and don'ts.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You'll remember a little more about yourself today after you indulge in a flight of fancy. You are the person you thought you were!
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You'll want to resume activities today that you may have had to suspend unwillingly in the recent past. You're back on track.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Issues of health will arise today, but not because you are displaying symptoms. Rather, your attitude and your outlook are not as strong and usual.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Today, you'll enjoy an increased sense of confidence, and the self-assurance that comes from knowing that you've done all you can.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Touchy subjects cannot be avoided today. Be sure to tuck your feelings away and are willing to confront others with openness and honesty.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – You may be unusually stubborn today–even for you! Now is the time to work closely with others in uncompromising situations.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – You'll find yourself warming up to an unusual idea today and seriously considering your part in an unforeseen alliance.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – A long-term wait of some kind is coming to an end, and you must prepare for a reunion or homecoming. It's time, once again, to share with others.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Choices, choices, choices! Today, you'll have more than your share – and be expected to remain true to your decisions from the onset.

Minutewomen remind Bearcats who's on top

By Jim Pignatiello
Collegian Staff

Eleven days – a cancelled road trip down south and one of the worst tragedies in United States history – separated the last two games played by the Massachusetts women's soccer team 12-11.

Binghamton	2

After this weekend's trip to Georgia and Auburn was cancelled, UMass coach Jim Rudy looked for, and found, a team willing to play at Totman Field on the UMass campus. The Binghamton Bearcats (3-2) were scheduled to take on Northeastern Saturday and had made the trip east, but school officials canceled the game on Friday.

Binghamton coach Jeff Leighman accepted the invitation to play, viewing it as a good opportunity for his team in its first year in Division 1 to take the field against a perennial powerhouse.

Meanwhile, the UMass squad saw Sunday's match up as an opportunity to end a long string of practices and get away from the television for a while.

"We were ready play," team captain Sarah Cook said. "Having practice for a week and a half straight isn't my cup of tea. I'd rather play games."

Despite the real possibility of showing rust and being distracted, the Minutewomen came out of the gate pushing the ball up the field and playing with the ferocity of a beast that was caged for too long.

A change in rotation helped the UMass squad as Rudy gave freshman Stephanie Santos her first start at forward.

"We flip-flopped the starting lineup with Santos starting and Wideberg coming off the bench because Wendy's been a little nervy and thinking about things too much," Rudy said. "We felt that if we bring her off the bench and let her see the game first, she can figure out what the flow is and then sort of mesh in with it."

The move certainly helped out both players. Santos scored the first two goals of the game, each coming off of assists by junior midfielder Martha Conover.

After a near miss just minutes before that hit the right post, sophomore forward Erin Lilly cut the ball back on the defender and let the ball fly across the face of the goal, past the diving BU goalkeeper, Lauren Cherry, and into the net at 44:38.

The 3-0 lead in the first half only scratches the surface of the level of domination achieved by the Minutewomen in the first 45:00. UMass out shot the Bearcats 10-1 and tallied 4 corners without allowing one.

Rudy decided to pull goalkeeper and reigning A-10 Defensive Player of the Year, Julie Podbransky, to start the second half. Sophomore Kelly Nigh replaced the senior in goal.

Another team leader, senior Brooke Bartlett, did not return to action in the second half. The all-Atlantic 10 first team selection hurt her knee just 14 minutes into the game and roughed it out for the remainder of the first, but couldn't go in the second.

"We were more precautionary there," Rudy said. "We just didn't want to press it too far. I felt confident in the people we put in there. I thought Andrea Trujillo did a really nice job, worrying the hell out of their left flank."

Trujillo and the rest of the UMass offense continued to wreak havoc, even without last year's leading scorer.

Lilly began the second half with her second shot off the post and

With heavy hearts, focus on the game

For the past week this campus and this nation have been engulfed in the sadness and sorrow brought on by Tuesday's terror attacks in New York and Washington, D.C. However, yesterdays afternoon 18 women did what they could to put the tragedy behind them, then carried on with their lives in the best way they knew how. They played soccer.

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team defeated Binghamton University 6-2 at Totman Field in the first UMass sporting event since the attacks. Adorned with American flags stapled to their sleeves and red, white and blue ribbons in their hair, with USA painted on their thighs the Minutewomen set out to do their part in returning us all to normalcy.

"It was good to get off our derrieres and get away from the TV and for at least a few scant moments have a sense of normalcy to our lives," said UMass coach Jim Rudy.

Rudy was instrumental in this game even being played in the first place. The Minutewomen originally scheduled road trip to the University of Georgia and Auburn University was cancelled on Thursday, leaving them 18 days between matches. Enter Binghamton University and coach Jim Leighman.

The Bearcats, playing their first season of Division 1 soccer, had been scheduled to play at Northeastern on Friday and at Providence on Sunday. However, with the Big East canceling all competition over the weekend the squad suddenly had an open date.

"Thursday morning Jim [Rudy] called me and wanted to play and I thought it was great," said Leighman.

"The opportunity to play a nationally ranked team is a big thing."

Adding to the confusion was the Friday match with Northeastern. After receiving assurances that the game would go ahead as scheduled the Bearcats departed Binghamton for Boston on Thursday afternoon. On the trip they received a phone call informing them that the game had been moved to Saturday morning. A second phone call received later that night confirmed that the game had officially been cancelled.

During their stay in Boston the Bearcats held a team meeting. Six squad members made the decision to return home to their families and not play on Sunday, a decision fully supported by Leightman.

"I didn't want to make anybody come and play who couldn't be here with their heart," said Leightman. "A bunch of them wanted to go home and see their families and felt very strongly about that. So I said look, go home. You need to be with your family if that's what you need to do."

After a week and a half of practice it was finally time for the Minutewomen to step back onto the field and release some of the tension that had built up inside of them. Both teams came out tight and had trouble putting together any sort of attack until the 27th minute when Erin Lilly won a long ball 25 yards from goal on the left wing and hit a square ball to Martha Conover in the center of the park. Conover then hit an angled ball to her right that found Stephanie Santos breaking into the box and the freshman calmly placed the ball past Bearcat goalkeeper Lauren Cherry for a 1-0 UMass lead.

That goal really seemed to lift the squad's spirit and ease the tension that was surrounding the match. After the goal the Minutewomen began to push forward with much more purpose and fervor. It was obvious to all in attendance that soccer was now firmly focused in the

Men's soccer cancelled

The Massachusetts men's soccer team was supposed to take the field Sunday afternoon for a game against the University of Hartford.

But like many other athletic events across the nation, the game was cancelled.

The UMass soccer Classic was originally scheduled for this weekend but after the well documented terrorist attacks on the United States, the four team tournament was reduced to a two-squad format. That was until head coach Sam Koch reconsidered the decision later in the week.

"I don't think this is the time to play a soccer match," Koch said.

So instead of facing the Hawks, who defeated the Minutemen 2-1 earlier this season, UMass will look forward to a road match-up with conference rival New Hampshire on Saturday.

Santos nets hat trick in first collegiate start

Sportswriters are always throwing around the term "coming-out party" as a way to describe a young, relatively unknown player's first great game that will make fans and media alike take notice.

University of Massachusetts freshman forward Stephanie Santos had her coming-out party in just her third collegiate game on Sunday afternoon at Totman field, proving she had adjusted quickly to college soccer.

"You don't count on anything out of your freshman," Coach Jim Rudy said. "You hope they are going to do well and kick into gear quickly, but it's hard to count on anything out of the freshman because you don't know what pressures come with being a freshman, in particular at UMass with the tradition and how much of a load they have to carry."

The Ludlow, MA native scored a hat trick in a 6-2 victory over the Binghamton Bearcats in the Massachusetts women's soccer team's first game in 11 days.

Santos started the game on the field for the first time in the young season and was immediately a dominant offensive force. She clanked a header off the post 15:00 into the contest – almost a warming shot to the Binghamton goalkeeper of things to come.

After some UMass near misses, Santos finally broke the scoreless tie at 26:53 on an assist from junior midfielder Martha Conover that began on a nice centering pass by sophomore forward Erin Lilly.

Santos and Conover hooked up again seven minutes later when No. 17 found the bouncing ball in front of the net and redirected it over the keeper's head for her second goal.

UMass went into halftime with a comfortable 3-0 lead, but it wasn't enough for the diaper dandy. The ball bounced around inside the box for a few moments until Santos pushed her way through the crowd to the ball and punched it into the top of the net at 58:26, essentially putting the contest out of reach.

First day back shaky for stocks; consumer confidence a concern

By Shawn Ilinitch
Collegian Staff

Wall Street reopened yesterday amid smoke from the still-smoldering rubble of the World Trade towers. The first day was a shaky one, with the market constantly fluctuating throughout the day before ending with a decisive decrease.

The Federal Reserve was busy before trading began, cutting the interest rate one half of a percent to three, the lowest level since September of 1992, about an hour before trading began.

"The Federal Reserve will continue to supply unusually large volumes of liquidity to the financial markets, as needed, until more normal market functioning is restored," the Reserve said in a statement.

The DOW at its worst point had lost 722 points, the largest drop in its history. It ended the day down 679 points. The NASDAQ lost 116 points on the day. Both markets fell to their lowest levels in nearly three years.

The airlines and insurance industries were hit the hardest. With no revenue for four days and the prospect of reduced business for at least the next six months, airlines are trying to figure how to survive. Midway airlines has already announced that they are going out of business while others, such as Continental Airlines, have announced major layoffs to deal with the prospect of reduced earnings.

Insurance companies were also hit hard. The flurry of claims that will soon be filed sent the stock prices dropping. American International Group, the largest insurance company on the market, watched its stock fall nearly three and a half percent to $71 at closing yesterday.

According to Robert Nakosteen, Professor of Finance and Operations Management in the School of Management, the worst should be over.

"If we can learn any lessons from the past, it is that the market makes its biggest adjustment (to a disaster) shortly after trading begins," said Nakosteen.

After the market drops as much as it did on Monday, people see some low stock prices and may feel that there are some bargains. After people begin to buy some of the stocks, the price begins to rise and some consumer confidence is restored.

This consumer confidence, according to Nakosteen, is the most important factor in the economy's future.

"The reaction of the market today would be accepted after any catastrophe of this magnitude," said Nakosteen. "It effects the stock market because of how shocking it was. It shatters consumer confidence of a bright future."

Nakosteen explained that markets tend to overreact, but it was hard to gauge how they would react today because of the unprecedented territory.

Last Tuesday's events, said Nakosteen, are having a bigger effect than normal catastrophic events.

"The effect is much more because there is a psychological effect," said Nakosteen. "it is very hard to predict what will happen because there has never been an event like this."

Although there is never a good time for a terrorist attack, last Tuesday was an especially inopportune moment for the markets. Coming at a time when consumer confidence was already low,

Nursing students show appreciation, send letters to St. Vincent's hospital

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The overworked, fatigued nursing staff at St. Vincent's Hospital in New York City – the hospital which has taken in more victims of Tuesday's attacks than any other – can expect a welcome surprise in coming days.

Christine King, a professor of nursing at the University of Massachusetts, has given students in her Perspectives in Nursing course the assignment of writing letters of appreciation to St. Vincent's staff.

"This is a way of addressing the intensity of the tragedy," King told The Daily Collegian. "Since the course is an introduction, I wanted to find a way I could bring into the class a way to show the impact on nurses, and to share our appreciation with nurses who were on the front line."

"We believe that sharing one's experiences is one of the most important parts of healing," she added. "I thought we could assist them by sharing our thoughts."

King devoted her Monday lecture to the attacks. She began the class with "From A Distance," a song by folksinger Nanci Griffith.

She instructed students simply to talk to the person seated next to them for five minutes, and then allow that person to talk for the next five. She later asked for volunteers to share their experiences with the class. Some students spoke about their conflicting desires for peace and revenge. One student wondered, "Why me? Why was I so lucky?"

"At first, I thought [the attacks] didn't really affect me directly," said Karena Viglioti, a first-year pre-Nursing major. Viglioti explained that she later learned that the husband of a former teacher was on board one of the hijacked planes.

"Hearing about that only made it worse," she said. Her grief culminated when she learned that the teacher had found a message on her answering machine that her husband had sent from aboard the plane.

After learning the responses of students, King told them about their letter-writing assignment.

"Often nurses don't know how appreciated they are," she said. "They're appreciated by patients and by the rest of us, who know they're there. What makes me feel some sense of comfort is knowing that nurses are out there."

She explained that St. Vincent's was chosen because, in addition to being near the World Trade Center and taking in a large number of patients, it also had the highest number of survivors of any New York hospital servicing the attack victims.

UMass students turn out to help fellow Americans

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

Across the nation, efforts to aid the victims of the terrorist attacks of one week ago continue full-strength. Blood drives continue locally, while emergency personnel are being asked not to flock to New York City uninvited.

The American Red Cross held a blood drive at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst yesterday. The drive, held in the Campus Center Auditorium, drew nearly a hundred people as of 12:30 p.m.

The response by the campus community following this tragedy has been "overwhelming," according to Registered Nurse and Team Supervisor Margaret McMahon.

"Its been unbelievable, right from the beginning," McMahon said. "This drive was scheduled prior to the attacks, and we were hoping for 75 units."

Although the drive had only collected 30 units of blood as of early afternoon, that number was not reflective of the drive.

"We only have nine beds," McMahon explained. "There's a lot of people waiting a long time to donate. People only bleed so fast."

The blood collected yesterday will go first to Springfield, packed in ice, and then sent on to Dedham, where the blood will be tested.

"Blood has a shelf life of 42 days," McMahon said. "They're going to start freezing it and it lasts longer that way."

Students, faculty, staff and other members of the Amherst community turned out to donate. Donors waited anywhere from two to three hours for their turn on the tables.

UMass football offensive lineman Chris Harris was facing the needle for the first time yesterday.

"I want to do anything I can to help the situation," Harris, an undeclared sophomore said. "I'm from New York, and I know people that were in that building. A pint of blood is nothing, but I'll do anything I can do."

Kristen George, a sophomore Pre-Nursing major sat next to Harris, waiting her turn to be screened by the nurses prior to donating.

"Anything people can do can help," George said. "There's a shortage of blood."

Harris and George waited over an hour to get this far, and still faced a wait to get onto the tables.

Danielle Smith, a Natural Resources senior, donated blood for the first time yesterday. She sat at a snack table set up for donors by Red Cross volunteers. Cookies and other snacks, as well as juices were set out to help avoid complications resulting from low blood sugar.

"I came out today because of the attacks, and the need for blood," Smith said. "Any support we can give, anything I can do, I'm going to do, and this was my first option."

Smith arrived at the Campus Center Auditorium at 10:15 a.m. Red Cross volunteers, who kept a close on donors in case they felt ill after donating, told her she could leave at 12:45 p.m. Smith had just come off the table at 12:30 p.m.

Maggie Cassel, a senior Psychology student, gives blood every year on her birthday. Yesterday, her twenty first, marked the last time she donates blood, due to restrictions placed on donors who have spent time in the United Kingdom.

"I got here about ten, and there were people lining up," Cassel said. "I filled out my paperwork as people were setting up."

Another drive has been scheduled for Wednesday, Sept. 26. Time and place are to be announced.

The state of New York has asked towns and cities in Massachusetts and other states to refrain from sending emergency response and medical personnel unless requested.

The Massachusetts Emergency Management Agency (MEMA) notified towns and cities last week that if needed, they would "be contacted by MEMA as the formal requests for assistance flow through the proper channels" from New York.

"The fear is that many cities and towns are beginning to spontaneously send medical and emergency response personnel and equipment to the site," MEMA said in a relapsed statement. "New York officials are concerned that they will be overwhelmed by this unsolicited assistance, which could become more of a hindrance than a help as they attempt to organize their assists at the scene."

MEMA is the state agency responsible for coordinating federal, state, and local resources to protect the public during disasters and emergencies.

The Massachusetts Department of Health had issued a call for support the day after the attacks, but soon stopped soliciting aid.

"We've had literally hundreds of phone calls by concerned doctors and nurses ever since the word went out

WTC support unshaken

By David Ariosto
Collegian Correspondent

In the aftermath of Tuesday's tragedy rescue workers continued to sort through the rubble and debris scattered in lower Manhattan. Where once stood the World Trade Center, considered by many as the very symbol of capitalism and globalization, now appears a scene of ruin and devastation.

In the damp morning mist, two distinct mountains of steel and concrete still smoldered, leaving a constant cloud of ash and smoke visible even from the New Jersey side of the Hudson River. Thunderstorms and high-winds further hampered workers in their continued search and rescue efforts.

Despite Friday's rain, fires persisted to burn in the depths of the substructures. "It looks like Hell's city," remarked one ironworker, "just like the pits of Hell."

Rescue workers also encountered the dangers of falling debris primarily from the unstable American Express and Liberty One buildings. One volunteer noted that, "you can actually see the buildings swaying and hear the metal shafts twisting in the wind."

Many sought shelter in the temporary New York Police Department headquarters set in the corner Burger King. Injured workers were also treated in the home of the Whopper where EMT's and nurses hung IV's from wall lamps. When each building threatened to collapse, workers would dart out of the mangled steel and flock to the headquarters, only to return again when it appeared safe.

Both Thursday night and Friday morning injured rescuers could be seen receiving medical treatment alongside food and construction supplies. Yet the morale of the workers seemed revitalized as an unknown New York fireman set an American flag atop the peak of the rubble.

Rescuers etched their way to the top of the ruin in ant-like columns, passing each piece of rubble down the line. As the cloud of dust and ash persisted to envelope the workers (consisting of firefighters, policemen, National Guard, EMT's, nurses, and iron workers) all were forced to wear charcoal respirators. Initially rescuers outnumbered the supplies and many only had surgical masks to protect their lungs from the thick, dark air, but by Saturday nearly everyone had been properly outfitted.

Around 4:00 a.m. Friday morning, workers' cheers bellowed over the storm as rescuers pulled a trapped police officer from the wreckage. The present condition and status of the officer is unknown.

By Saturday the fervent volunteer support had not relented as the Javitz Center, the designated volunteer hub, was forced to turn away eager citizens. Traveling from cities as far away as Miami, Chicago and even Toronto, volunteers reached New York seemingly unaware of what to do and where to go, but nevertheless journeyed in hopes to support the crisis.

Despite the arrival of countless volunteers, the Salvation Army chapters and Red Cross stations throughout the city continue to require citizen assistance. Recruits have worked throughout the night in hopes to sustain the steady flow of clothes, food and medical supplies replenishing ground zero.

The outpouring of support also reached Penn Station, NY as NJ Transit, Amtrak, and Long Island Railroad all provided rescue workers free passage to and from the city. Manhattan residents have filled their windows with burning candles, and occasionally one will pass a church congregation somberly singing 'America, America.'

One NYC Fireman may have put it best. After a twelve hour onsite shift he exclaimed; "it's a shame that it takes such a tragedy to bring the country together, but at least it is coming together."

National Briefs

By Virginia Avedision
Collegian Staff

New York – Just blocks away from the massive rubble heap that once was the World Trade Center, the streets of Lower Manhattan were bustling again Monday as business resumed for the first time since last week's terrorist attacks. Thousands of rescue workers continued their round the clock mission to clear away debris and search for anyone that may still be alive in the rubble.

As a dusty haze lilled the area, the New York Stock Exchange, a mere three blocks from the World Trade Center, was passing out some 5,000 face masks to employees. The City Health Department said tests have shown that asbestos levels are safe, yet residents and workers should protect themselves against leftover dust and soot.

The markets were closed for four days which is the longest shutdown since the Great Depression, because so many of its workers were lost or injured in the attack. Also, many of the communications and utilities needed to trade stocks were damaged or destroyed.

A large American flag was draped across the columns of the New York Stock Exchange facade. Smaller versions were carried by Wall Street employees who populated the streets that were left empty after the attacks.

About 4,500 National Guard troops, along with state and local police patrolled the streets.

The Brooklyn Bridge, which leads directly into Lower Manhattan, was open Monday to pedestrian and vehicle traffic. Subways were operating throughout the city, with slower and limited service around the Wall Street area. The Staten Island Ferry also resumed service Monday morning. Across the water from the pier, where commuters stepped onto the morning ferry, smoke and steam still rose from the altered Manhattan skyline.

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and his staff who abandoned City Hall when it lost electricity and phone service Tuesday, returned to work on Monday.

Most public schools were open and students from the eight schools nearest the World Trade Center site were attending classes at other schools around the city Monday.

On Sunday, Giuliani said there were 190 confirmed deaths in New York, 115 of which have been identified. He revised the number of missing from the World Trade Center attacks down to 4,957 from an earlier figure of 5,097.

Giuliani said the rescue operation will continue until all hope is gone. No survivors have been rescued from the wreckage since Wednesday.

Washington D.C. – The U.S. Postal Service is resuming the shipment of letters on commercial airlines. The Federal Aviation Administration approved the step on Monday, restoring a method of transport that normally moves 20 percent or more of the mail. Federal Express, which has a contract to fly about three million pounds daily, helped to return some mail to the air on Thursday. Yet the ban on sending mail via most passenger-carrying planes remained in effect until Monday. After the terrorist attacks last week, the aviation system was virtually shut down. During the airline stoppage the post office added more space on Amtrak trains, contracted for additional space with 7,000 trucking companies and used its own fleet of trucks to move mail, but still experienced delays.

Florida – Hurricane Gabrielle strengthened slightly in the north Atlantic on Monday with winds reaching near 80 mph, yet was moving away from Bermuda.

A tropical storm warning was still posted for the island, but the National Hurricane Center in Miami said the warning would most likely be discontinued later Monday.

At 2 p.m. EDT, Gabrielle was centered about 260 miles north of Bermuda and had been moving eastnortheast at 18 mph.

Gabrielle, the third hurricane of the season, was expected to maintain that course well into Tuesday.

Gabrielle's hurricane-force winds extended outward up to 30 miles and tropical storm force winds extended outward up to 290 miles.

The hurricane soaked Florida over the weekend, providing some relief from a drought affecting most of the state. At its peak, the storm cut power to more than half a million homes and businesses, with most customers restored by the end of the weekend.

Further out in the Atlantic, Tropical Storm Felix was downgraded from a hurricane after its maximum sustained winds dropped below 74 mph.

Massachusetts – Boston Harbor was shut down Sunday for about three hours after the U.S. Coast Guard received two bomb threats.

After a sweep of the area, Coast Guard officials found no sign of anything suspicious and reopened most of the harbor. One reserve channel, an area where vessels move in and out of the harbor itself, remained closed Sunday morning.

Mississippi – In a symbolic message of the nation's "resolve to fight back," the destroyer USS Cole set sail again Sunday after a terrorist attack that killed 17 sailors.

Early Friday, the Cole was put back into the water and towed a short distance to a mooring at Ingalls Shipbuilding in southern Mississippi.

The destroyer's engines were not started, but it was a powerful message for the U.S. Navy following Tuesday's terrorist strikes on New York and Washington.

The 505-foot guided missile destroyer has undergone extensive renovation since the October 12, 2000 bombing that killed 17 of its crew and wounded 39. The ship is not scheduled to return to its homeport at Norfolk, VA. until April 2002.

Two suicide bombers pulled alongside the vessel during a port call in Aden, Yemen, and detonated explosives that blew a 40-foot hole in its side.

Chief Gunner's Mate Norman Larson said he "wished the United States had struck back soon after last year's attack on his ship."

State News

Boston – Firefighters responded to a fire inside the Prudential Center in Boston just after 10:15 a.m. Monday morning, with crews quickly extinguishing a fire at the scene of some remodeling on the 32nd floor.

The two-alarm fire reportedly broke out in an equipment storage closet as workers were removing asbestos.

"We had a fire in construction equipment on the 32nd floor, but the fire is knocked down," Boston Fire Department Chief Paul Christian said at about 10:45 a.m.

Employees still reeling from the attacks on the high-rise World Trade Center building in New York last week fled the building. Under normal circumstances, an evacuation order probably would not have been given, but following the terrorist attacks building officials did not take any chances.

Some of those who evacuated the building said it was difficult to see and breathe as they left the building. "Between [floors] 46 and 45 it was very smoky and very gassy," one worker said, according to a report by the Boston Globe.

"Terror at first. My heart sank into my stomach," said another. Several employees said they worried about the fact they never heard an alarm before being evacuated.

Gillette employees were given the rest of the day off, although the Prudential was still open for business.

There were no reports of any injuries.

Boston – The loss of New York's World Trade Center towers means that Bostonians will no longer enjoy one spectacular view of the city.

John Hancock Financial Services has made a decision to permanently close the 60th floor observatory in Copley Square out of security concerns.

Arguably, it is the most spectacular view of Boston and its surrounding suburbs. That's why some 400,000 visitors annually visit the 60th floor observatory at the John Hancock tower. But it's an attraction that will now be closed to the public.

On Tuesday, workers at the Hancock building were evacuated shortly after the attacks in New York. The office tower opened a day later with barricades on the streets and a sign that stated that the observatory would be closed until further notice. Company officials announced Friday that the closure is permanent.

In a statement, the director of security wrote: "Unfortunately, once they are inside, it is very difficult to control or limit their access to other parts of the building. That creates a significant security concern."

Private functions scheduled for the rest of the year will still take place, but no new reservations will be taken after January. The observatory has been an attraction in Boston since 1976.

this afternoon that we were looking for volunteers," Deputy Commissioner of Public Health Paul Jacobsen said in a released statement. "Our phone has been ringing off the hook."

In addition, MEMA has set guidelines for donations of money and materials. The Executive Secretary of the Massachusetts Voluntary Organizations Active in Disaster (MVOAD) Nancy Murphydoyle, in a released statement, described the outpouring of aid "overwhelming."

"People in all walks of life are calling to pitch in and help any way they can," Murphydoyle said. "Make sure you know what is needed before you make a donation or launch an appeal for donations."

Material goods are not needed at this time, Murphydoyle explained.

"New York's immediate material needs are being met through existing compacts and through the Federal Response Plan."

Cash donations should not be sent, although organizations will accept checks made out to established disaster relief and other organizations. A list of such organizations are available on MVOAD's website, ht tp://www.disaster-relief.net/mvoad.

Blood donations are encouraged.

"As we all know, there is and will continue to be an ongoing need for blood. Please be patient. We know you want to help now and are heartened by your response," Murphydoyle said. "Help us in a way that truly helps us help the victims. Make an appointment with the Red Cross for the days and weeks ahead when the need for blood is going to be greater.

"First and foremost the victims and their families, the responders, and the country is in need of your prayers," Murphydoyle continued. "The need for spiritual reflection cannot be overstated."

All inquiries regarding financial donations and volunteerism should be directed to the Donations Coordination Team Hotline at 1-800-293-4301.

Bush spreads message of peace

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

President George W. Bush has spent much of his time this weekend reassuring Americans and vowing to bring the terrorists involved in the attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center to justice.

The President explained in an address to the American people from Camp David in Thurmont, Maryland that the government would not allow terrorist acts to go unpunished in the United States.

"They will try to hide, they will try to avoid the United States and our allies – but we're not going to let them. They run to the hills; they find holes to get in. And we will do whatever it takes to smoke them out and get them running, and we're going to get them no matter what it takes," Bush said. "Listen, this is a great nation and we are kind people. None of us could have envisioned the barbaric acts of these terrorists. But they have stirred up the might of the American people, and we're going to get them no matter what it takes."

Attorney General John Ashcroft also made similar comments, pledging his support for the President and explaining that the government along with the FBI has made every attempt to find out as much information about the incident and those involved as possible.

"The FBI, along with very cooperative local and state officials and law enforcement agencies has processed thousands of leads," Ashcroft explained. "We are making the kinds of contacts and developing the information that allow us to describe this as proceeding with reasonable success. We believe that the picture is developing the kind of clarity that is appropriate."

White House officials also made comments about the losses of the allies of the United States and how this tragedy affected people from other countries.

"We should take note, it's not just Americans who lost lives in the World Trade Center–dozens of countries lost lives and they realize that this was an attack against them as well," Secretary of State Colin Powell explained. "We are receiving expressions of support from around the world- and not just rhetorical support, but real support for whatever may lay ahead in this campaign that is ahead of us to win the war that the President has spoken about."

The President previously explained that he felt that these attacks were a declaration of war against the United States and that this would be a long and difficult trial for the country. He solidified his statements to the American people even further by informing the military that they should be ready for war. He explained that there were talks of mobilizing the Reserve and Guard troops and that the government was in the process of call up as many as 35,000 such troops to maintain air defenses and perform roles as military police officers.

"The message is for everybody who wears a uniform: get ready. The United States will do whatever it takes to win this war. And I ask patience of the American people," the President said. "There is no question in my mind we'll have the resolve–I've witnessed it yesterday on the construction site. Behind the sadness and the exhaustion, there is a desire by the American people, not to seek only revenge but to win a war against barbaric behavior."

The President also spread a message of peace to Americans asking for tolerance for Muslims across the country. He explained that although many people may be angry about the events that took place on Tuesday that channeling it into anger towards fellow Americans was detrimental.

"America counts millions of Muslims amongst our citizens, and they need to be treated with respect," the President said. "Women who cover their heads in this country must be comfortable going outside their homes. Moms who wear cover must not be intimidated in America. That's not the America I know. That's not the America I value."

the tragic events may push the economy into a recession.

Nakosteen said, "The economy was weak already. Last Tuesday's events are further eroding consumer confidence."

The good news, according to Nakosteen, is that consumers were still spending a good amount of money prior to the attacks.

Another factor that helped to support the markets yesterday was the decision by many companies to buy back their own stock when it reached low prices.

Looking ahead, military action may help to keep the economy out of a recession. Nakosteen said, "Military activity helps out a fragile economy because of increased government pumping money into the market."

"If we go into any type of war, the economy may be able to stay out of a recession," added Nakosteen.

Companies that may be benefited by military spending were some of the few to see increases. Raytheon, a defense contractor, rose nearly 27 percent, from $24.85 to $31.50 by closing yesterday.

[Their nurses] see an overwhelming number of distressing things. Life in the 'Happy Valley', as we call it, is a piece of cake compared to working at St. Vincent's.

The nursing students were excited by the assignment.

"I think it's nice," said Michelle Stevens, a sophomore. "I'm a nurse's aide, and an Emergency Medical Technician, and I would be glad to get [a letter] like this. Hopefully I'll make somebody happy about what they're doing."

King, who has herself worked as a nurse, described the joy of knowing their actions are appreciated.

"It's just amazing that people…tell you what a difference you've made," she said. "When they do, it invigorates you to know you've touched so many lives. Any human being needs reinforcement to say, 'I'm doing the right thing.'"

Government invasions

Protect our privacy

We must not let this nationwide tragedy lead to an endless amount of personal tragedy in the years to come.

We must not let the government use these terrible events as a way of getting its foot in the door of all our personal lives.

The specter of Big Brother has been looming ever closer since George Orwell first put pen to paper. Intrusion into all our lives by those who have power has been a constant worry to those of an independent mindset, and these people at the moment are quaking with great fear. And, we say, with great right.

The Bush administration, with great willingness from Congress, is moving to place itself firmly in our business with the Sept. 11 massacre as its excuse. In the name of national self-defense they ask us to give up our personal privacy.

The FBI already has its Carnivore program in place at several major email companies, scanning our private letters for whatever keywords they deem incriminating. No warrant, no reason for suspect, but our electronic mail is free game for our government 'betters' to pass judgment on us. It is only poised to become worse.

A loosening of restrictions on federal phone taps is one of the worst domestic dangers that we currently face. Vice President Cheney is demanding that all the phones a suspect may use should be able to be tapped at the federal government's discretion, rather than just the phone listed on the warrant issued by a judge, as is the rule today. There has also been talk of simply having phone taps available at the FBI/CIA's will, with no warrant needed, no judge's approval. The horrors of this – persecution, racial profiling, rampant invasion of privacy with no real use – would drastically alter the lives of many unsuspecting victims.

Also, the movement to ban encryption software protecting personal email from devices such as Carnivore and other snooping programs – public and private – must be stopped. Privacy programs are there for just that reason – every human being has the right to know that their private correspondence is not being perused by Uncle Sam and used for who knows what purpose.

Would these measures prevent some crimes? Some attacks? That is an unknown, although the odds are that there would be at least some governmental success stories from these new invasive policies. However, that gain must be held up against the risk that such intrusion into private business will cause in historically free America.

At what price must order come? At the cost of freedom? Any precedent in unnecessary and blanket government prying into private life without any checks must cause horror in a freedom-loving people. We must not let these propositions pass, no matter what horror we may feel at last week's terrible events.

American ignorance; our biggest weakness

On most weekends, I look forward to going home and not thinking about my life at school. I work a mindless job (pizza delivery) and keep myself free from schoolwork.

This weekend, however, was different.

It was different when I stopped for gas at a station I frequent, outside four or five American flags flew in the wind. As I entered the store, I realized something was not right. The owner of the store usually has a sign of above the door with his name on it. Now it was gone. He took it down, my doubt because his name is Mohammed Kabir.

Did he have to take it down? I certainly he felt that he did. I don't know what nationality or religion he is, but to the people who live around my town that probably doesn't matter. He is definitely Muslim, and Arabic people are responsible for the attacks, right? That is how most people in my town feel.

I tried to gauge his attitude. I felt bad, embarrassed that he had to change his name down. I wanted to tell him that I

SHAWN ILINITCH

OK. I know he is a good citizen. He looked at his wife wearing her traditional Muslim head dress peering out of the window. Could she be nervous that something was going to happen? I felt bad for her too.

I walked to the counter to purchase my gas and a bottle of soda.

"Yes my friend," he said, as he always does, "anything else today?"

The words now seemed a little sinks now. He has called me "my friend" every time I have been there since my first visit. Would he say the same words to one of my ignorant neighbors behind me and risk an outburst?

All of this time, I hoped I was overanalyzing this. Maybe I was not giving the people in my town enough credit.

I went home and I was off to work. I was curious to see how people would react to my bosses, who are Egyptian. People would not realize that they are here trying to make enough money to get an education. They have bought the pizza place to try and save up money.

They told me things had been all right, but after I finished a shift I realized that they were thinking wishfully. It was the slowest Friday I had seen in a long time. Maybe people were just not in the mood for pizza, but I doubt it, because the place next door towned by a Greek couple) was packed.

The next day I noticed my bosses had bought a small flag and put it on the counter. I did not ask them why. Did they have something to prove? Were they trying to prove it? I hoped not.

As the day went on, I would feel nervous every time I came back from a delivery and saw a pickup truck with a veteran license plate or even a gun rack, which are common on pickup trucks in my town. Did one of my neighbors take a stereotype too far and assume my bosses, my friends, were somehow involved in the attacks? Were they here for revenge?

I prayed not.

At UMass, we have to be careful not to be ignorant or use stereotypes. Whoever is found responsible for the terrible attacks does not represent the majority of their people. Osama bin Laden is not the head of the Muslim religion. He does not speak or act in the names of all Muslims, only a small portion of extreme religious fanatics.

> "Take time now to embrace our fellow American citizens, whether they are Muslim, Arab, or purple Americans. They feel pain as citizens."

As the nation mourns, it is logical to look for someone to blame, to seek justice, to demand justice. Justice will not be found in persecuting people of Arabic descent or of the Muslim religion in this country. Many of these people are United States' citizens. Many of them pledge allegiance to the United States of America.

People of all colors and religion were sure to have felt pain last Tuesday. They felt pain as human beings.

When Timothy McVeigh bombed the federal building in Oklahoma, did Americans run around and throw bricks through the windows of white American centers? No, because we realized that McVeigh did not represent white America.

Take time now to embrace our fellow American citizens, whether they are Muslim, Arab, or purple Americans. They feel pain as citizens. They may have known somebody in the towers.

Now is not the time to point fingers.

America's heroes

METHOD ZAGAMI

"And when you don't die of a trouble somehow you begin to convert it - make use of it, I mean."
Saul Bellow.

Words do not exist that can be manipulated to express what we are going through right now as a nation, as families, communities, friends, co-workers or peers. It has been one week since last Tuesday, which brought with it, the largest tragedy our collective sight has ever witnessed.

You must seek out and accept the education which comes along with each heartache you face. You must take what has happened and use it to reflect on how precious life is. Life is made up of failures, unattained goals, and periods of strife and each one of them is blessed for there will be a time when you can't experience those anymore and it could arrive sooner than you had ever imagined.

Since Tuesday all I have been able to think of are the people I love; Are they okay? Are they safe? But mostly, do they know how much I love them and what they mean to me? I believe everything happens for a particular reason. Everything in my life, good and bad, has occurred at the appropriate time. I can't say there is any real reason for the horror that has taken place but If I try to understand it in terms of what positivity, if any at all, will come from it, it's that we will start working together as a people. Perhaps this is our time to realize the immensity and implications of our unity. It is time to recognize that without each other we are nothing. We divide ourselves by race, creed and income. We are slow to call upon our neighbors and claim that we are equals. I have witnessed incidents too numerous to count on the news, here at school and everywhere else that show every ingredient of a self-proclaimed melting pot coming together, in this, our greatest time of need. Those responsible for this have burned holes in our landscape and struck our nerve centers. What they did not count on was our knowledge that unity is essential for survival. We now realize that we are truly from the same mold and that differences matter little when we are all dealing with the same loss, experiencing the same anguish and fighting the same battle.

I do not pretend to have a great knowledge of politics. I don't know much about our foreign policy. But what I do know is this, my country has often lied to me, misled me in textbooks, made itself appear innocent when it was indeed guilty. And it has not always listened or taken everything it should into consideration, but it is ours. We stand behind it. We will fight for it. We will help it heal.

> "We live in a lifetime where we constantly look for heroes. It is apparent now that they have been here among us the whole time."

For a week I have been listening to two sides. One saying that we might have gotten what we deserved, the other, outraged, confused and angry. And what I have to say to the former is you would not be so quick to blame your nation if you had a father on one of those flights. You would not feel that "we had it coming" if your aunt worked on the hundredth floor of the World Trade Center and you would not protest retaliation if your best friend is a firefighter who perished at the hands of an evil whose very existence evokes a fear and hatred so great it cannot be fathomed by the good people of our great nation.

As students, we are quick to criticize corporations and draw battle lines with many American ideals and institutions. The news media is not tracking ratings right now. Companies are sending free food and beverages to rescue workers. And in New York City, storeowners are allowing people to come in, take the supplies they need and leave, without paying for a thing. Concert promoters everywhere are contributing proceeds from their ticket sales to relief funds and The Red Cross. And I watch my president, a man I didn't vote for, never would've voted for and I have never felt so much respect and hope. I see Mayor Guiliani holding pictures of the missing as he walks among the mourning and Tom Brokaw with tears welling in his eyes and I am so very grateful for this synthesis of competence, devotion and integrity.

We live in a lifetime where we constantly look for heroes. It is apparent now that they have been here among us the whole time. As you read this they are going through the rubble, they are giving blood, they are making donations and they are praying. They are standing next to you and sitting behind you. The human spirit makes heroes of us all and ultimately, it is our strongest weapon.

The healing process will be long, it will last lifetimes. You must recognize and appreciate our freedom. You must constantly remember how precious and beautiful life is. And whoever your higher power is, whatever Christ, Buddha or Science you believe placed us here, you must seek it out and let it guide you and provide you with explanations for the terror, sadness and tragedy. Console the people who need you and be grateful that they are there for you. Together we will make use of this great trouble, we will convert it and we will not be defeated.

Letters to the Editor:

In the face of adversity, a country united

To the editor:

I want to thank you, students, for reminding me what America is all about. Like many of you I have, for a while, felt alienated from my country and embarrassed by its policies and actions around the world. Even our so-called freedom, the very symbol of America, has seemed like a lie. We have freedom to choose our representatives in the electoral process, but they turn out to be paper figures manipulated by special interest groups. So why bother? Why care? But during this last tumultuous week I have read the messages from the Student Government Association representatives and the Collegian editorials, and I have realized that it is possible to love your country while you dislike its policies, and to love it with all your heart. You have shown me also through your sensitive, respectful actions and words during the last week that there is only the greatest hope for America's future. Any doubts I may have had are gone.

As I drive to work in Amherst and pass the little town along the way, I see American flags proudly hanging everywhere. Only last week I would have seen them and felt slightly annoyed. Now the sight brings tears to my eyes. I can once again feel what it means to be American. It must be much the same feeling the pioneers had when they settled our beautiful valley. But for us, it is so much more. Now, America is a land that encompasses people of all cultures. There is much work to be done. For the pioneers, the work was building houses and planting gardens. For us, it is the monumental task of bringing peace to our earth.

Thank you, students. I am proud to be associated with you at this University. You are America's future. I place my vote in you.

Sincerely,
Linda Roney
BDIC Coordinator

To the editor:

I am writing to you in response to the events that have occurred in New York City as well as the articles that have appeared in the Collegian about it. I am a sophomore here at UMass and grew up in Manhattan. Growing up, I would sometimes wish to have lived in a house with a yard. But I didn't have a yard. The island was my backyard, and now I feel that a portion of it was taken away.

When I first heard of the plane crashes into the World Trade Center, I did not quite believe it and asked my friend to repeat himself. During the next two hours, reality started to hit harder and harder. I was anxious to get in touch with my father who does not work near the World Trade Center. I was worried anyway. When I finally got through to him, he explained what had happened in as much detail as he could, and I could picture it in my mind. After my conversation with my father I went outside and sat by the pond trying to make heads or tails of the situation.

That seems to be what a lot of people are doing right now, and probably will for a while. I have realized that there are no head or tails. There is no answer. This is a horrible experience, and I am thankful I did not know anyone who perished in any of the crashes. I still felt the need to call everyone I know and I do have friends who knew people who died. I send my support and love to all of them as well as everyone who has heartache because of this.

Now I must decide which direction to go. I can look at this with anger and pain and question it every day of my life, or I can look at this as a time to start anew. I do not want war. I do believe that the people who did this are cowards and the fact that they would kill innocent people disgusts me. But I would rather see them caught than start a terrible, possibly long-lasting war.

I look to everyone to join together in a peaceful manner and send love and hope to everyone around the world who knew people who have passed away. Look at the success and togetherness of UMass' vigil. We are only one university within an immense country. There are many out there who still want answers but no one can give them. What we must do is give what we can. I am hurt that my backyard is different but we can rebuild and nothing is set in stone.

Lastly, I want to thank everyone, both those I know well and even those I don't, who have tried to help me through this time. You have shown how much you care I thank you with all my heart. If we continue to show compassion and not anger, we will be able to not only recover from this devastating event, but also rebuild our world.

Sincerely,
Caitlin Jaffe

Folds ignites the ivories at Avalon

By Jake D. Lewis

BEN FOLDS
Avalon
September 15

At the end of every concert (or Conan O'Brien appearance) Ben Folds has a trademark move where he grabs the stool, lifts it high over his head, and then hurls it at his piano. This has come to be as expected as The Who smashing their guitars, or Billy Joel ending his shows with the maxim "Don't take any shit from anyone!"

Throwing his seat at his instrument is not the only thing that fans have come to expect from the leader of the piano-led punk rock band. Followers also look forward to Folds' knack at improvisation, his interactions with the crowd, and, of course, the songs that have propelled him to fame.

This past weekend Folds took to the stage at Boston's Avalon Ballroom, on his tour to promote his debut solo album Rockin' the Suburbs. The tiny club was filled to capacity with people of all ages and backgrounds, a testament to the draw of the music and its artist.

Before Folds, though, one-man band Bleu performed a forty-minute set. Armed only with a guitar and with a synthesizer playing all the other instruments, the crowd was respectful of the Boston native and Avalon regular. At one point between songs he even spoke briefly about the tragedy in New York, and how everyone should do something to help. This unpleasant topic was soon remedied by more music, including a song that was half-rock, half-house, and one of the best he played.

After a brief break, it was time for Ben Folds and his newly assembled band (which he joked should be called Big Ben and the Clockpuckers). The set, which consisted of songs only from the new CD may not have been very familiar to some in attendance, but they were just as equally embraced and enjoyed by all. The band began with the song "Not the Same" from the new CD, which pays homage to former Ben Folds Five bandmate Robert Sledge. Appropriately, the audience applauded at this reference.

"Zak and Sara" was next up, followed by "Annie Waits" and "Losing Lisa," three songs that show both lyrical intelligence and humor that is reminiscent of bands like Barenaked Ladies and Cake. It was at this time that Folds played "Hiro's Song (Karaoke Supernova)," an unreleased song about a 54 year-old Japanese businessman who leaves his wife for his daughter's best friend, only in turn to be jilted by her as she cheats on him with the drummer of a rock band. Folds adds heart to this song which on the surface is purely comic.

In between songs, Folds drank water and talked with the audience. However, at one point someone shouted, "Play a song!" Folds then launched into an impromptu number where he should stop drinking water, shut up and keep playing. Not only did this have the audience laughing, but it took a few minutes for the band to pull it together as well. The skinny piano man pulled off his sweatshirt, which had the girls screaming, then went back into his set.

Another improvised song called "Make Me, Mommy!" had Ben step away from his piano and play the guitar as his other singers took over. The hard rock song, about a mother (sung by Folds) who is telling her kids what to do, was highly amusing, as well as a different variety of music than fans are used to hearing.

He ended the hour-and-twenty minute set with the album's title track, "Rockin' the Suburbs" where he played the keyboard/guitar thing (please excuse my naivety on musical instruments). The profanity-laden song, which Folds teased wasn't "hip enough for alternative Boston radio" tied the set perfectly together, and left the audience wanting more.

During the encore, Folds paid respect to both his former band members as well as the audience as he played two songs from his previous albums, with no other accompaniment than himself at the piano. The crowd reacted favorably to the acoustic, unplugged sound of "Best Imitation of Myself" and "One Angry Dwarf." The touching, romantic ballad "The Luckiest" from the new CD came afterwards, and the show ended with the band mates returning to the stage for "Song for the Dumped." It was the perfect closer to a great show.

While any Ben Folds CD can rock the suburbs, there's no experience like seeing him in concert. He has remained just as strong a performer and musician in his efforts as a solo artist. It's fair to say that in Boston, Folds rocked the city.

Iowa a twisted second look into the world of Slipknot

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

SLIPKNOT
Iowa
Roadrunner

There's a crazy little world, full of confusion and contradiction, that exists in and around Slipknot, making them much more interesting than most metal bands. For one, they're among a handful of metal bands that get any sort of mainstream critical attention, meaning reviews from non-metalheads, which can be both intriguing and pathetically condescending. At the same time, their music is so outside of the mainstream that radio and MTV ignore them, save for the token track on each album with a blatantly melodic chorus ("Left Behind," from Iowa is making the rounds now, it was "Wait and Bleed" from their self-titled album).

Even inside the metal community, Slipknot is impossible to define easily. A friend of mine, a militant black metal/grindcore/death metal enthusiast, listens to absolutely no new mainstream metal, except for Slipknot, whose insane aggression and chaotic double-bass drumming he can't get enough of. Meanwhile, Slipknot already has the nu-metal masses by the leash, due to, I think, their cathartic lyrics, since their music is heavier than any nightmare that ever woke Linkin Park.

This wacky atmosphere around Slipknot is contained perfectly inside of Iowa. The album never stands still, shooting in all sorts of directions throughout the 14 tracks, but never betraying the central tones of relentlessness and confrontation. This isn't to say the album is perfect, however; nothing this sprawling could be, and it probably doesn't want to be. But it's nonetheless every bit as interesting and conflicted as the band and its mystery.

If "Left Behind" had you expecting a cleaner, more radio-friendly group of nine mask wearing men in boiler suits, let it be known that Iowa is every bit as dirty, abrasive and mainstream-repellent as the first album. After dispensing with the now wholly unnecessary throwing everything they can at you. The real trick is that it doesn't sound disjointed; it doesn't flow effortlessly, but on the whole it's a very cohesive album for one with so many elements. Now you can own your own little piece of Iowa pressed onto a CD, complete with a glimpse of the horror within its borders and the intensity it inspires.

From here on in it's just general anarchy, with the beautiful chaos of nine people going at their instruments yet still all sounding like they're on the same page. The spotlight never shines on certain members specifically, there's just a strong group sound, with the menacing drums and Taylor's desperate shrieks coming off as dominant. Every once and awhile a little melody will shine through, offering just enough hope between the ceaseless heaviness of the likes of "Disasterpiece" or the twisted, slowly crawling sounds of "Gently."

The lyrics, as always, have a tendency to be over-the-top with the potty mouth and indecipherable expressions ("I'm the paradox deity vessel"), but their rough edges make the impenetrable density a little easier to roll with. And there are some neat-o phrases to be found, like the viciously clever wordplay in "My Plague," which states "Your impossible ego fuck is like a/ Megalomaniacal tab on my tongue."

The music is best when it goes full on for melody or heaviness and least compelling when it settles for the comfy in-between. "My Plague" is an excellent sing/scream chunky/smooth hybrid that recalls many similar acts in the metal and hardcore scenes today, like Haste, and does the balancing act just as well as any of them. "Left Behind" is along the same lines, and if Slipknot can create tuneful tracks as good (and as heavy) as these, they should never be accused of "selling out." Especially when such songs stand along side scorchers like "New Abortion" or "Metabolic," the second of which could easily, towards the end, be briefly mistaken for a Dimmu Borgir song.

I'm a confessed speed freak, though, so drawn out and minimal "Skin Ticket" and the title track don't do it for me, but like their brethren "Tattered and Torn" and "Scissors" from the previous album, they do establish a mood of suitable depravity. And, while certainly not what I would consider easy listening, if the purpose of the final track is to communicate the message that Iowa is one vast, throbbing hellhole, than it does its job very well.

As solid as the first album was, Iowa feels like the definitive statement from Slipknot. The packaging is incredible, and the band comes with guns blazing, throwing everything they can at you. The real trick is that it doesn't sound disjointed; it doesn't flow effortlessly, but on the whole it's a very cohesive album for one with so many elements. Now you can own your own little piece of Iowa pressed onto a CD, complete with a glimpse of the horror within its borders and the intensity it inspires.

Mattel re-releases He-Man figures

By Mark Menard
The Nicholls Worth (Nicholls State U.)

(U-WIRE) THIBODAUX, La. — Toy company Mattel has decided to breathe new life into the hero of many children brought up in the '80s.

This Christmas, just before his 20th birthday, He-Man and his assorted friends and enemies will return to toy departments across the country. The characters have been completely revamped and retooled for a younger audience.

The first assortment will include six figures. Mattel will update three heroic warriors — He-Man, his friend and mentor Man-At-Arms, and bird man Stratos. Mattel will also reintroduce three evil warriors — dark lord Skeletor, ape-like Beast Man and amphibious Mer-Man. Mattel already has second and third assortments planned, as well as an array of vehicles and animals. An all-new animated series is also on the way. But will Mattel be able to replicate its fantastic first-run with "the most powerful man in the universe?"

In 1981, Mattel was in debt after backing the failed Intellivision video game system.

They needed a big hit fast and were looking into basing a toy line around the Arnold Schwarzenegger film Conan the Barbarian.

When it came time to test-market the character sketches to children, the kids liked a blonde-haired version better than the real Conan. Mattel decided to create their own character based on the preferred sketch and named him He-Man.

Originally, He-Man was a barbarian who was chosen to defend Castle Grayskull. He got his power from his magical armor and weapons. This story was told through mini-comics packaged with the first assortment, or wave, of figures.

The first wave, released in 1982, featured eight characters. On the side of good were He-Man, Man-At-Arms, Stratos and the warrior woman Teela. Including Teela was a risk. Female figures at the time did not sell well, and many companies did not make them. It was one of the many groundbreaking choices Mattel made with the line.

The evil warriors were Skeletor, Beast Man and Mer-Man. Mattel also created a neutral character named Zodac.

One of the biggest keys to the toy line's success came at the end of 1983 from the Federal Communications Commission. The FCC reversed a landmark decision made in 1969.

They had previously ruled that cartoon series' on television could not be based on toy lines. The FCC feared these shows would become 30-minute commercials.

The ruling caused Hot Wheels, a cartoon based on Mattel's toy car line, to be pulled from the airwaves. When the ruling was reversed in 1983, Mattel was poised to capitalize.

They quickly set plans in motion for a He-Man cartoon and contracted Filmation to create the series. Filmation changed He-Man's story, turning him from barbarian to prince. This is the version most people remember.

In Filmation's version, He-Man was really Prince Adam, part of the ruling family on the planet of Eternia. Adam had always been destined to be a great hero. When he turned 18, he was given a mystical sword by the Sorceress of Castle Grayskull.

With the help of the sword and a spoken incantation, he turned into He-Man, the most powerful man in the universe. It was not long before children across the country could be heard shouting, "By the power of Grayskull!"

The show was an instant hit, and the toy line benefited greatly. In 1984, Mattel sold over 55 million figures worldwide. Mattel also made another groundbreaking decision that year.

In an effort to compete with Hasbro's G. I. Joe line, Mattel began giving each character its own special play feature. Sy-Klone spun like a tornado, Whiplash thrashed his tail and Stinkor, well, stunk to high heaven (especially after being cooped up in that little plastic bubble before being opened)!

In this respect, Masters of the Universe inspired almost every action figure line that came after it.

Super Powers, Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles and Batman, among others, have all shown He-Man's influence.

The decision also pushed Masters of the Universe to the top of the toy heap. In 1985, its peak year, the line made $450 million in pure profit for Mattel.

Mattel thought they could duplicate their success in the girls' toy market. In 1985, they debuted She-Ra, He-Man's twin sister, complete with her own Filmation cartoon.

However, since all cartoon resources went into She-Ra: Princess of Power, it effectively ended production on He-Man and the Masters of the Universe. This was the beginning of the end for He-Man.

In 1987, the Masters of the Universe motion picture came and went without much notice. She-Ra was also canceled that year after only two seasons.

What some consider to be Mattel's fatal mistake was when they flooded the stores with He-Man merchandise following the motion picture's release. When it came time for another assortment, stores still had this merchandise in stock and did not buy new items.

Mattel tried relaunching He-Man in 1989 as a space explorer but failed to generate any excitement. And so the He-Man saga was thought to be over.

Then, a wave of '80s nostalgia began sweeping across the country toward the end of the '90s.

He-Man's original fans were now adults and looked back fondly on their youth. Mattel had a plan to cater to these fans.

Earlier this year, Mattel re-released 10 original Masters of the Universe figures. The figures were pulled from the 1982 and 1983 assortments.

They released three "good guys" — He-Man, Teela and Man-At-Arms — and seven "bad guys" — Skeletor, Beast Man, Mer-Man, Teela's evil counterpart Evil Lyn, the bionically-enhanced Trap Jaw, the three-eyed Tri-Klops and the robotic He-Man impostor Faker.

Mattel also included He-Man's tiger steed, Battle Cat, and the evil version, Panthor.

American tragedy inspires unity of citizens of every descent

By Shauna Billings
Collegian Staff

In the wake of last Tuesday's violent terrorist attacks, the hearts, minds and lives of all Americans have changed. And while the news has widely covered the coming together of a nation, it has little covered an important issue affecting many citizens of this country – hatred and violence directed towards those who are Muslim or are of Middle Eastern descent.

One might wonder why, in a column that typically discusses the latest heel height or how hip khaki is, bigotry and racism is being discussed. It is because this hatred is unfounded, and it is because it is based solely on appearance.

Appearance has long stood as a way for humans to show their ideas, loyalties and political opinions. On St. Patrick's Day, Irish proudly wear green, while in contrast, the Orangemen of Northern Ireland wear sashes of orange, honoring William of Orange who conquered Ireland, as they walk through Irish Catholic communities. Suffragettes sometimes wore a Bloomer costume, which consisted of a shorter skirt and billowy pants beneath it, to promote equality for women. Flower children of the 60's wore beaded headbands and tie-dyed shirts to show their free ideologies and to rebel against the constraining clothing that their parents wore. Many Christians wear crosses and many Jewish people wear the Star of David upon chains around their necks. All these are examples of people showing proudly what they believe – and they have a right to wear these symbols of their beliefs, whether other agree or not.

But many times in this world, people have inflicted cruelty on others based on their appearance – an appearance that can often NOT show what a person stands for, or truly shows one aspect of their beliefs. Hatred based solely on the color of someone's skin, on the shape of their eyes, on the texture of their hair has long poisoned this country and the world. In Nazi Germany, anyone with a Jewish appearance had the potential to be discriminated against or killed. The Nazis had studies of physical differences in appearance that would show if someone were of Jewish descent. Coming home from the Vietnam War, soldiers in uniform were attacked and harassed as "baby killers," whether they ever fired a gun, believed in the war, or not. People have long judged others based solely on one physical characteristic or on one article of dress. They do not look into the souls and hearts of those that they hurt. These ignorant people judge entire communities based upon one idea held by a people, or one story heard about people of a certain community – and these ignorant people could cause massive damage.

There are many Muslim citizens of this country, as well as many citizens of Middle Eastern descent. And in the past week, there have been enumerate attacks or verbal harassment of these citizens. These Americans are suffering in their hearts just as all Americans are over what has happened. Those killed in the attacks were of all races, all religions and all ideologies. While the attacks have made bonds of many different peoples in this country, some ignorant and bitter Americans have turned their hatred and anger upon their fellow Americans in acts of retaliation towards those one, see as the same as terrorists.

There have been instances of assault and battery, firebombs, and verbal harassment. One group that has specifically been targeted is Muslim women who wear veils, or hijab, which are meant to emphasize modesty and dignity. The veils are also a mode of showing pride in one's culture and religion. However, it is visibly marking these women as practitioners of the Muslim faith to those who harbor hatred in their hearts.

Just as Christians would not like to all be judged by fringe cults like the one led by David Koresh, and just as many white people are angered and horrified by the actions of the Klu Klux Klan, Muslims and people of Middle Eastern descent are saddened by the terrorist attacks. They have no tie to the vengeful actions, and do not deserve to be treated as if they do.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said in his famous speech, "I have a dream that my four little children will one das live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin but by the content of their character."

Our country just suffered a horrific tragedy, which has served to bring the country, and the world, closer together. In this time of patriotism and selflessness, perhaps we can finally make Dr. King's immortal words come true. Let us judge others on their character, on their commitment to this great nation, and on their treatment of others. It is our character and our constitutions that make us Americans. And it is the joining of so many different people, and so many different characters, that make us the most powerful country in the world.

If you are interested in learning more about Middle Eastern culture, a lecture, "The Veiled Beauty: An Evening with Wendy Buonaventura" will take place on Thursday, September 20 at 7:30 p.m. in Herter 251. The lecture will focus on dance as a tradition and healing ritual, and will include video presentations of Arabic dance.

not cure all of the pain and suffering for those who lost loved ones in the horrific actions of Tuesday. Football can't be the complete healer of those in this entire country who were affected by this past week. But what football can do is be a distraction.

For an entire Sunday, legions of fans can sit down and watch a game. A game that these fans have been watching from generation to generation. It is a game that people enjoy to play, whether it is organized or just a simple game in the back yard with a bunch of friends. But now, these people realize that a sport that at some points they took for life and death situations, is now and always has been, just a game. These people will now cherish these games more than they previously had. Because even if it is for a couple of hours, there will be some sense of normalcy in people's lives. It will not bring everything back to complete normality, but what is does do is to be with loved ones and complete strangers and all enjoy the same thing at one time without malice towards each other.

I am one of those who took this game too seriously at some points. In two weeks, the Patriots will take on the Indianapolis Colts at Foxboro Stadium. For weeks, I have known that I was going to the game, but also for weeks I have taken the game for granted as a game between two teams that I care nothing about.

Now I will take enjoyment in being in the crowd with 60,000 people. Even though I will not know 59,996 of them, I will enjoy there company. For those hours at the stadium, I will be enjoying a contest, and not worrying about a tragedy.

■ baseball

should undeniably cheer for Bonds to get the record. That story would not only be good for baseball, but good for our country. This will, in some respects, exemplify the resiliency and hard work which we as Americans pride ourselves on. Our country needs this excitement right now.

Furthermore, when fans go to the ballpark now, patriotism will be at its highest. No longer will 40,000 people half-heartedly sing "The Star-Spangled Banner" like it is a chore. Before last night's game in St. Louis, Cardinals fans shared patriotism, brotherhood, and tears as the American flag flew and our anthem was sung. Through baseball, tens of thousands of people showed they were proud to be Americans.

By taking the field again, baseball and its players will help ease the pain of the tragedy. After so much sadness during the past week, baseball will be something to take our minds off the events and return our lives to normal.

Of course, our lives can never be as normal as they once were. But baseball will help us get through this. We should never forget what happened on September 11, but we should not dwell on the events for too long. For if we embrace the things that mean so much to our country, like baseball, then the American spirit will be unharmed and unbroken.

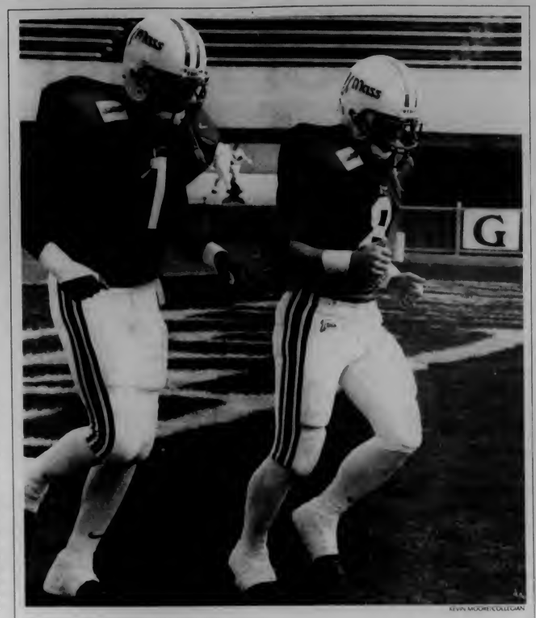
the same way that they did before the incident.

It has only been one week.

For myself, being a native New Yorker it was extremely tough coping with that horrific day. All thoughts of hearing Jordan saying, "I'm back" for a second time were dismissed from my mind.



Now I wish I could ask the question: how good he will play at the age of 38? Now, times have changed and I have to ask myself if America will go to war or not.

How quickly a mindset can change?

Exactly one week ago tonight, I went to bed horrified. In fact if you are a human, you were horrified too.

JMU athletes agree with cancellations

By Khalil Garriott
The Breeze (James Madison U.)

(U-WIRE) HARRISONBURG, Va. — Sometimes the games just aren't as important as the state of our nation. Because of Tuesday's tragedies in New York, Washington, D.C. and Pennsylvania, James Madison University administration made the decision to postpone all athletic events (both home and away) between Wednesday and Sunday.

"This is a sad time for America and a time for reflection," JMU Athletics Director Jeff Bourne said in a press release Tuesday. "Out of respect for those touched by this tragedy and as part of our national mourning, we felt it was essential that the weekend athletic events be called off."

An entire slate of competitions was affected by the decision to cancel the games. JMU football was scheduled to play Florida Atlantic at Bridgeforth Stadium on Saturday, but both schools agreed not to take the risk of flying after the terrorist attacks that have shocked the nation. The decision was then made to be consistent with all sports, resulting in the immediate postponement of eight varsity teams with events scheduled through Sunday.

"I don't think any of us would have played at our peak performances, and I didn't think it'd be appropriate to play," freshman volleyball player Emily Ericksen said. Ericksen added that as of press time, the team didn't know if their games were rescheduled.

Both soccer teams were to play games this week – the women's team's contest with Penn State scheduled for Thursday at 5 p.m. was rescheduled for Monday, and the men's JMU Invitational on Friday and Sunday was postponed. A four-team event, JMU was set to play Temple at 7:30 p.m. on Friday. Volleyball was also supposed to host a tournament, the five-team Madison Invitational, on Saturday and Sunday. The Dukes were scheduled to face off against Marshall at 1 p.m. and Winthrop at 7 p.m. Saturday.

Women's tennis was also affected. It was scheduled to play in the West Virginia Invitational. Several athletes, including junior Christy Micheaux, went home for the weekend to be with their families. Micheaux is from Harrison City, Pa.

"I was glad they [cancelled the games], I really couldn't see us competing after what happened," women's tennis coach Maria Malerba said.

The team went to its first practice, which was optional, but spent most of the time talking about the incident. "You could just see that nothing we were going to do would be real effective. Playing tennis just seemed so insignificant after that event," Malerba said.

Field hockey was slated to play William & Mary and Virginia Commonwealth on Saturday and Sunday, respectively. The Dukes will face off with the Tribe on Tuesday. Women's golf was to travel the furthest distance. Their match at Minnesota was postponed. The men's cross country team's road meet against Penn State was to be held Saturday.

Players from all of the teams with schedule changes were affected by the attack.

"We had two games from the tournament canceled, but we're trying to reschedule them for later in the season," freshman goalkeeper Brant Bower said.

The tournament itself will not be made up, but the two canceled games will be rescheduled during the week, between two Saturday games, according to Bower.

Bower added that at the time, some of the players thought they knew someone who was directly involved in the tragedy.

"Under the circumstances, I think it was a good reason to cancel them," Bower said.

A large percentage of JMU students, including many varsity athletes, are from the Northern Virginia/Washington, D.C. and New York areas. Five volleyball players, two tennis players, 16 football players, one golfer and eight men's cross country runners are from the northeastern United States. Six football players and seven men's cross country runners are from the nation's capital or the surrounding areas.

It is unclear how the postponements will affect each team's scheduling for the rest of the fall season. Malerba expects some type of policy, but advises that anything can change.

"I don't know if the administration will come up with a policy about flying to events later in the year; it's probably a wait-and-see situation right now," Malerba said. "Events can change day by day; something big can happen and change everything."

Senior Steve Prisco will look to take his role of No. 1 singles player to a whole new level in 2001

Fall racquet-eering

Autumn ball early test for the young Minuteman squad

By Melissa Shattuck
Collegian Staff

After a successful spring season, the Massachusetts men's Tennis team is preparing to begin their fall campaign. The men's tennis team made school history last spring by reaching the conference finals for the first time. Its season opens this Saturday, when it will head to Williamstown to face both Binghamton and Williams College.

The men's tennis team is expecting a lot from itself in the upcoming weeks. Its fall season is not necessarily important in terms of conference play, seeing as it only has one conference match against Rhode Island. It's important for the freshman to get a feel for college tennis. Senior Steve Prisco feels as though "fall is basically a warm-up for the spring."

Coach Judy Dixon has realistic expectations for the upcoming season. While she is expecting a lot from her players, she sees the fall season as a time to rebuild. The fall tennis season is seen as more of a time to focus on developing the team.

"We'll play the fall as a time to build," Dixon said. "The fall season is a time to work on match play, conditioning, and players' confidence."

As for meaningful matches this fall, Dixon sees Connecticut as her team's biggest match. "UConn is huge, they are our biggest rival," Dixon stated. The most important match in terms of importance to the team is Rhode Island. The match against St. John's has been moved to the spring season, and the ECAC tournament has been cancelled.

The team has lost starter Bill Greener, and standout Brent Davis has not returned to UMass for his sophomore year. Davis along with Prisco were named A-10 All-Conference players last spring. But Davis has chosen to attend school on the West Coast allowing him to be closer to his family.

"The team will miss him in both singles and doubles play, and someone will have to step in," Dixon said.

There have been several changes to the roster this fall. One of the biggest challenges the team will have to overcome is the loss of player Rory Theis. Theis will be out for the fall season due to a disk problem. Theis played a major role in both singles and doubles play last year.

"The team has rallied around that idea, and have decided to step-up and play bigger tennis," Dixon said.

The loss of Theis in the fall season means that the Minutemen will be expecting a lot more from its new members. Freshman Reid Stubbs of Florida and Scott Sams-Leeb of Northern California will be placed at the heart of the line-up. Dixon is expecting these two to play third and fourth singles.

Junior Eric Reblin of Texas will be another key addition to the team. Reblin will probably play No. 5 singles, and is also a very good doubles player. Reblin attended UMass as a freshman, but returned to Texas. He came back to UMass last year, but due to NCAA rules was ineligible to play.

"I'm expecting him to step-up big, and he can't wait to get back on the court," Dixon said.

Prisco expects the team to win their five dual league matches, but it's going to be tough.

"We're all going to have to work harder," Prisco said.

Prisco, a 3-year veteran of the team has been practicing hard in the off-season, and is expecting the best year of his career.

"Experience will carry me a long way," he said.

The experience of Prisco and senior Todd Champeau will help to lead the team to yet another successful season.

Unfortunately for the Minutemen, freshman sensation Brent Davis left the team this year to be closer to his family. He will be missed at No. 2 singles.

Why the NFL was right

Fourth and inches
with David Rose

Last weekend was a time for grieving. A chance for the nation to get with loved ones and mourn the lost of those who were tragically taken from us in Tuesday's attacks on New York City.

It was time for the NFL to take a weekend off. It was the right decision. With home games in Washington, New Jersey and Philadelphia, eerily close to the attack sites of the past week and with the threat of boycott of most of it's players, including those from the Jets, Giants and Redskins, the NFL had no other option.

The games last week were too feeble and trivial compared to what was going on in this country. If week two had gone on as scheduled, it would have been a ghastly mistake and one that the NFL would have regretted more than when Pete Rozelle decided that the games would go on two days after John F. Kennedy's assaination in 1963.

Now that the NFL is back to being as normal as possible, I can say that I am more than happy to see it back. I will be happy to see Green Bay's Ahman Green run into the end zone and then do the famous "Lambeau Leap" into a group of happy, joyous fans that revel being with an NFL player, even if it is when beer is being spilled all over them.

I will enjoy seeing "Fireman Ed" at Giants Stadium leading the chant of F-I-T-S, Jets, Jets, Jets." While this fireman will be bring joy to those in the stadium, real firemen will still searching the wreckage in New York City, doing what they have done best, making this country proud.

And now that the regular officials just signed a new contract and will be back at work, I will especially enjoy seeing Referee Phil Luckett screw up more coin tosses during overtimes and certain important calls during the game. I will now look at those plays with laughter and remind myself that he is human and he can make mistakes, except when the 49ers are playing.

Now, even those things that I could not stand to see will now be a welcome relief. Emmitt Smith is on my least favorite team of all, the Dallas Cowboys. He is about to break Walter Payton's all-time rushing record, which up until a week ago would have been a major disappointment to me cause I like the Cowboys about as much as I do getting a route canal with no novacaine. But now, I have a different perspective on things and this is a major milestone in the game of football that Smith is about to pass. It is something for people in Dallas and those who are NFL fans to look forward to. The record means a lot less now than it would have meant a week ago, but still, it gives us fans something to cheer for.

Football can't be the complete healer of this entire situation, it will

Baseball brings U.S. together

Hit and Run
with Andy Vogt

In light of the horrific events that transpired this past Tuesday in New York and Washington, baseball and other organizations shut down as the nation dealt with this terrible tragedy. Now, Major League Baseball is ready to resume play as our whole country continues to grieve.

Is it too soon for baseball to take the field once again?

The argument is up for debate, but one thing is for certain: baseball will be something that keeps our nation strong while the overwhelming sadness of last week's events continues to loom. The previous sentence may sound completely clichéd, but right now the United States truly needs sports, especially baseball, while we mourn as a nation.

Baseball unites our country like nothing else, especially as the season moves into September and October. Morning subway rides across the land are filled with hurrying businessmen, newspapers and coffee, and talk of last night's box scores. Complete strangers can strike up a conversation because of a common love and passion for baseball. Questions can be heard, from "Why did Kerrigan put in Derek Lowe in the 9th?" to "Am I the only one that hopes Clemens tears his rotator cuff in his next start?" to "Who the heck is this Roy Oswalt guy?" To many Americans, baseball isn't just a sport, it's a part of who they are.

Before last Tuesday's tragedy, there were numerous intriguing stories developing as the season started to wind down. Barry Bonds was on pace to eclipse Mark McGwire's single-season home run record of 70. The Seattle Mariners continued their assault on the New York Yankees AL record for wins in a season. No-names like Albert Pujols, Lance Berkman, and Doug Mientkiewicz emerged as some of baseball's youngest and brightest stars. And multiple pennant races began, as the National League divisional and wild card standings turned into a horse race. Baseball fans were getting fired up for what was sure to be a wide-open postseason.

Then tragedy occurred.

The horrors of last week were undeniably fueled by hatred. The evil perpetrators shared a common hatred for the United States, maybe for cruelties they think our government might have committed, but more so because of what the United States is. Our country as a people share common loves. Love for democracy, love for our nation, love for other Americans, and to a lesser degree, love for something like baseball. All the terrorists shared were a common hatred.

Three years ago, our country was thrown into a frenzy as McGwire and Sammy Sosa were neck-in-neck to see who could destroy Roger Maris's home run record first, and to what degree. For several months, the story captivated us as the feel-good story of the summer. Now that Bonds is on the verge of that same greatness, people are hesitant to root for him because of character issues he might have. However, fans across the country

Jordan comeback dwarfed by American tragedy

GLEN STRAUB

Exactly one week ago today I woke up with excitement. In fact, if you are a fan of basketball, you were excited too.

Last Monday night, the greatest basketball player in the history of the sport, Michael Jordan, declared to three reporters from the Associated Press, Chicago Sun-Times and CNNSI.com that the public should expect a news conference regarding his potential comeback to the National Basketball Association.

He did not say at the time if he would definitely make a comeback, but iterated that, "I'm doing it for the love of the game. Nothing else. For the love of the game."

Since his retirement from the Chicago Bulls in 1999, Jordan has always said that he is "99 percent sure" that he would not make a second comeback to the sport that he dominated for so many years. However, this summer, people who spent time with the six-time world champion hinted to the media that his work ethic has increased in order to get into "game" shape.

The 38-year old Jordan currently is the President and partial owner of the NBA franchise, Washington Wizards. If he were to make a return to the court he would follow in the footsteps of his hockey counterpart Mario Lemieux and play for the team that he runs.

When the day started on Tuesday, Sept. 11, Jordan's news conference and potential comeback was the biggest news to come out of our nation's capital.

However, at around 9:00 a.m. EST on that Tuesday morning, like many people around the nation, my excitement suddenly turned into dismay.

The images of two 110-story buildings fallen to the ground, our military headquarters destroyed and thousands of people hurt or killed made all of the hoopla over one man's decision to return to a sport seem trivial.

In the time he has been in the public eye, Michael Jordan has been labeled at times as a Superman-like hero and sometimes even compared to God. All this praise is just for his unreal basketball playing skills.

However, he is a human like the rest of us and like all of the people around the country, what he viewed on Tuesday seemed to be the most unreal thing he had ever seen.

Realizing that his news conference meant close to nothing – now that war had been declared on the nation and millions of people had been horrified – Jordan postponed any sort of announcement of his return.

With training camp starting only three weeks from now, nobody is sure what "his airness" will do or say next.

He told the Chicago Sun-Times on Saturday that he might not announce anything till October. He also said that the announcement would come in fax form.

"All this talk about me, with everything else going on?" he told Sun-Times columnist Rick Telander in disgust. "With all this, what does what I do matter?"

It's a great question Michael and you should be asking it. The fact is, though, America is in need of some normalcy and your face in the news can help breed some normalcy to the people around the nation.

It will take months to get back to everyday life for most Americans. For the people were directly affected by the tragedy (who lost loved ones or their workplaces), they may never feel

SGA President John Sheehan, who has raised some eyebrows in student government by changing his appointees to the Attorney General and Chair of Finance positions.

SGA Coordinating Council set to discuss controversial position swap

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

Tonight members of the Student Government Association's Coordinating Council will meet to discuss issues surrounding a proposed switch in the elected Executive cabinet.

A decision was made by President John Sheehan over the summer to move appointed Attorney General Gabriel Tavares to Chair of Finance and appointed Chair of Finance Mike Marin to Attorney General.

The motion, which was tabled during the SGA's previous Coordinating Council meeting, has left some members of the council in favor, as well as some feeling apprehension.

"I just question why they didn't both run for the positions in the first place and instead being switched in the middle of the summer," Coordinating Council member Michel Taugher said.

Tavares and Marin both claimed to be surprised yet excited when first made aware of Sheehan's appointed changes. Tavares explained that he wanted the position of Chair of Finance to begin with.

"It's the position I wanted in the beginning," Tavares said. "I'm more familiar with Allen Brainerd [Director of Legal Services] and the bookkeeping so it's easier for me transferring into this position."

Marin shared similar feelings by explaining that at the time of elections he wanted to be the SGA Attorney General. He continued to explain that the position of Attorney General was not there for him, but Secretary of Finance.

"I wanted to be the Attorney General, but at that time Chair of Finance was the [position] made available to me," Marin said. "I was shocked when I first heard of the change, but am more excited to be in this position."

Questions of why the decision was made by Sheehan in the beginning were on some member's minds. Sheehan was approached repeatedly for comment but had not elected to do so as of press time.

Speaker Aaron Saunders provided his own explanation regarding the appointed switch.

"If John [Sheehan] feels this is what is best for his cabinet and will work the best for the SGA then I think that is commendable," Saunders said. "John's changing his mind is not a criminal act, but a commendable one. The fact that he can say he made a mistake and needs it to change isn't controversial but the right decision."

Tavares and Marin have both been acting under their switched positions, which have yet to be ratified by the Coordinating Council. When asked about the legalities of the situation, Saunders explained that it is legal for them to act in their new positions.

"It's completely legal for them to be performing their duties under John's [Sheehan] appointed switch," Saunders said. "People have a misrepresented idea of what the Senate and Coordinating Council does. All we do is confirm the appointed change, but they have every right to act in that position."

Saunders further explained that if they (appointed members) were not confirmed in thirty days under the Senate or Coordinating Council the appointed changes would stay with or without their consent.

The Coordinating Council will also be discussing other issues regarding the University of Massachusetts student body such as the upcoming SGA Senate elections.

Elections, which are scheduled to take place this Friday, have kept Saunders as well as other members of the SGA on their toes.

"This year has blown me away, we have all but four seats filled and races in three areas at large," Saunders said. "I'm optimistic that were going to exceed the required five percent student vote and receive twelve to fifteen percent student vote this Friday."

Saunders explained that he expects to see ten to fifteen write-in candidates on this Friday's ballots as well.

This year's election ballot will also contain two referendum questions up for student vote. One question regards student's opinions of the cameras placed on dormitories around campus. The second question will address an increase of three dollars on the student's activity fee, thus raising the $75 fee, to $78.

All these issues will be discussed at tonight's meeting in the SGA office (Room 420 in the Student Union) at 7 p.m.

UMass library system makes new changes to leadership, location

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts library system recently combined the administrative leadership of the Physical Sciences and Engineering Library and the Biological Sciences Library in addition to separating the music services and collections department among other service areas in the W.E.B. Du Bois Library.

Laurence Feldman, the former coordinator of the Biological Sciences Library, now acts as head of the Sciences and Engineering Libraries system, which encompasses both of the science collections at UMass.

The Physical Science and Engineering Library on the second floor of the Lederle Graduate Research Center contains resources in astronomy, biochemistry, chemistry, computer science, engineering, food science, mathematics, physics, polymer science and wood technology.

In contrast, the Biological Sciences Library, located in room 214 of the Morrill Science Center, is the principal location for recourses in biological sciences, geology, agriculture, and geography.

The change, as Coordinator of User Services Betty Brace pointed out, was made due to concern that smaller departments of the UMass library system might become too top heavy and not fully utilize the skills of the people on their staff.

"Any changes we make in administration are always ways we can maximize our people," said Brace. "If one person can do what two heads of smaller departments can do, the other person can be freed up to do other work dealing more in their areas of expertise."

Due to this alteration in leadership, Eric Esau, the previous head of the Physical Science and Engineering Library, was relocated to the Collection Development Department in the Du Bois Library where he filled the position of bibliographer for fields in physical sciences and engineering, taking on some responsibilities of recent retiree Linda Amy.

In the UMass library system, changes in leadership were accompanied by changes in locations.

Services and collections from the music department are no longer provided on the 19th floor of the Du Bois Library since the materials were spread out among other departments due to low numbers in public traffic. Music books and scores are the only sections of music services that have remained stationary in their position, the library's 18th floor.

As for using compact discs, audiotapes, videotapes, LP's, or playback equipment, students must go to the Microforms and Music Media Center on the main floor of the Du Bois Library.

Also located on the main floor, the Reference and Information Desk, part of Reference Services, now offers the music reference collection.

Just as before this adjustment in locality, music librarian Pam Juengling is in charge of all the music reference materials. However, she is unsure if this change was for the best.

"I think it [the change in location] makes it more difficult for students because now resources are spread out in different areas rather than staying in one location," she said. "It's simply less efficient."

Nonetheless, Juengling admits the change brings a positive effect in that it makes the reference materials more accessible to students, explaining that the Reference Desk is open for longer periods of time in a given day than the old music services department used to be.

Brace too felt the location changes make the music resources more accessible to the general public.

"The 19th floor was difficult to access because it was in a remote location," she noted, "but now it's more accessible for everyone to walk in very quickly and utilize the services, whereas before it was like our little well kept secret."

The Monument and Werfel score collections have also been moved to the reserve area on the third floor of the Du Bois Library while other music reserves remain in the Music Reserve Lab in room 149 of the Fine Arts Center.

Memorial to be held today for UMass alumna killed in last week's tragic attacks

A memorial is being held today for University of Massachusetts alumna Jessica Sachs. Sachs was on board American Airlines flight 11, the first plane to fly into the World Trade Center in New York City on September 11.

COURTESY OF MERCY HOUSE

Sachs was an accounting major that graduated in January 2001 and went directly to Boston to work as an auditor for Pricewaterhouse-Coopers. She was on her way to California on a business trip for the firm.

Jessica Sachs was born April 22, 1978. Originally from Warwick, Rhode Island, she graduated from John Marshall High School in Rochester, Minnesota. She came to UMass after her parents moved to Billerica, Massachusetts five years ago. She is survived by one sister and one brother, both older.

Sachs was active with the Management department on campus and participated in Career Day activities, as well as with Christian groups including Campus Crusade for Christ and INTERVarsity, another Christian student group on campus.

According to Melanie Krumrey, wife of pastor Robert Krumrey of the First Baptist Church in Amherst, Sachs was also a "sharp student," and "dedicated to academics." She graduated with Honors and was in the Golden Key Honor Society, the National Society of Collegiate Scholars and in the Beta Gamma Sigma Society. Sachs was also a leader in the Mercyhouse church.

The memorial service will be held today, Wednesday, Sept. 19, at 3:00 p.m. at the First Baptist Church in Amherst, located at 434 North Pleasant Street.

Department of defense prepares for action

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

The United States is gearing up to fight a new kind of war.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, in a Pentagon press briefing, told reporters that the new war on terrorism would not "be quick or easy."

"This is a very new type of conflict, or battle or campaign or war or effort, for the United States. As we gather information, we're preparing appropriate courses of action. And as I've suggested, they run across the political and economic and financial, military, intelligence spectrum," Rumsfeld said. "It's not a matter of a single event. We're talking about a very broadly based campaign to go after the terrorist problem where it exists, and it exists in countries across the globe."

The current target of the United States is the al Qaeda network, Arabic for 'The Base', the terrorist umbrella organization, allegedly led and funded primarily by Saudi exile Osama bin Laden has been the prime suspect since the identities of the hijackers were revealed late last week.

"As I've indicated, this one network, al Qaeda, that's receiving so much discussion and publicity, may have activities in 50 to 60 countries, including the United States," Rumsfeld explained. "Therefore, it will not be quick and it will not be easy. Our adversaries are not one or two terrorist leaders, or even a single terrorist organization or network. It's a broad network of individuals and organizations that are determined to terrorize and, in so doing, to deny us the very essence of what we are: free people."

The problem with fighting terrorists, Rumsfeld says, is that there are no clear enemies and there are no clear targets for military response.

"This adversary is different. It does not have high-value targets that we can go after. But those countries that support them and give sanctuary do have such targets. The terrorists do not function in a vacuum. They work, they train and they plan in countries. They're benefiting from the support of governments," Rumsfeld said. "They're benefiting from the support of non-governmental organizations that are either actively supporting them with money, intelligence and weapons or allowing them to function on their territory and tolerating if not encouraging their activities."

In President George W. Bush's Sept. 11 address to the nation, Bush sent a clear message: "We will make no distinction between the terrorists who committed these acts and those who harbor them." The government is taking this charge seriously, Rumsfeld says.

"In either case, it has to stop. We'll have to deal with the networks. One of the ways to do that is to drain the swamp they live in. And that means dealing not only with the terrorists, but those who harbor terrorists. This will take a long, sustained effort," Rumsfeld said. "People and organizations and countries that do things that are this damaging–not just to our country but to the world–do need to be held accountable. And there are a variety of ways of holding people accountable."

The State Department is also targeting al Qaeda, as well as bin Laden.

"We are after the al Qaeda network. It is not one individual: it's lots of individuals and it's lots of cells. As I said on television yesterday, Osama bin Laden is the chairman of a holding company and within that holding company are terrorist cells and organizations in dozens of countries around the world, any one of them capable of committing a terrorist act," Powell said in a meeting with reporters. "So it is not enough to get one individual, although we will start with that one individual. But in the first round of this campaign, we have to deal with the perpetrators of the attacks against America in New York and in Washington. It is becoming clearer with each passing hour, with each passing day, that it is the al Qaeda network, that is the prime suspect, as the President has said. And all roads lead to the leader of that organization, Osama bin Laden, and his location in Afghanistan."

The objective, Powell stressed, can only be reached with the cooperation of the rest of the world. Pakistan, at the request of the United States, has sent a delegation to persuade Afghanistan to turn over bin Laden, who is reportedly living under the Taliban's protection.

"We are pleased that the Pakistani government sent emissaries in to try to persuade the Afghans, the Taliban leadership, that they should do what they have been required to do for a number of years under UN resolutions and reject this presence in their country, this invasion of their country by a terrorist organization," Powell said. "The Taliban, of course, is responding in the way that it always has: that Osama bin Laden and his associates are guests in their country. Well, it is time for the guests to leave."

Our opinion:

Blanket your anger

One week later and the numbers are still staggering. The loss of life is still huge. The city of New York is still destroyed. The pentagon is still in ruins.

These are not easy things to comprehend. All that most of us are left with here is our insecurities with the future, the dim hope that things will turn around and anger. Oh, the anger.

Yesterday morning, America paused in a moment of silence. Again. No amount of silence and no amount of 'God Bless America' will ever change what has happened, but the respect that we have held together for our country and for our fallen citizens has made us a stronger people. Everyone has a different idea of how the United States should confront the problem. This is only fair in a country that promotes freedom of speech and of expression as a basis for a way of life.

Some things are not right, though. The backlash against Arab-Americans, HAS begun to take place, and with it has come a backlash against Indian-Americans. In particular, Sikhs, a religious group of Indian people that dress in a traditional rube and headdress, and Muslims have been targeted for their physical similarities to the terrorists allegedly from Afghanistan responsible for the travesty at the World Trade Centers, in Washington, and in Pennsylvania.

In Mesa, Ariz., Sunday, Balbir Singh Sodhi was gunned down in cold blood while he landscaped the Chevron station that he proudly owned. As an Indian Sikh member, he wears a long garb and headdress that resembles Osama bin Laden's.

A man from Queens, N.Y. was shot in the head with a BB gun as he left his place of worship. He was also an Indian, and was leaving his temple. A Fairfax, Virg. Sikh was driven off the road by two vans as he went to donate blood. Coincidences?

Mosques have been attacked. People have been attacked. A way of life has been attacked. These are not potential problems, they have already occurred. People in their frustration and confusion have already lashed out at innocent people, with devastating results. These kinds of things cannot be tolerated. One cannot plead ignorance when a case is tried in a courtroom.

Perhaps these attacks were inevitable due to the extreme ignorance that plagues much of our society. That does not excuse them. One of the goals of the Trade Center massacres and other crashes was to tear apart the American society, to turn Americans against Americans. While we have pulled together remarkably as a people and stood together patriotically, an innocent group of our fellow citizens has been plagued with fear and hatred, for no other reason than the way they look and what they believe. We at the Collegian would ask that you remember that the guilty parties have yet to be captured and tried in court. Do not condemn your neighbors, no matter how much you fear and need someone to blame.

God bless who?

SAM WILKINSON

"God Bless Us, Every one says Tiny Tim." God Bless America say the signs on Route 9 from Northampton.

It's strange how God Bless can be used in so many different ways. Tiny Tim was happy. He'd just gotten a turkey, and Mr. Scrooge was a good guy all of a sudden. The God Bless America on Route 9 is something else all together. I don't really think we were blessed last week. I think we're hoping to be blessed again.

It's been an awful week and a day since the horrible attacks.

On September 11, I was mortified. Not just for the people in the towers and in the Pentagon, even though I couldn't and can't believe what they are going through, but also because of the fourth news headline, the somewhat forgotten tragedy in this whole awful disaster.

"Plane Crashes 80 miles south of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania."

That's my hometown. That's Morgantown, West Virginia. That headline kept coming across the bottom of my television with no more information because frankly, two buildings hadn't collapsed 80 miles south of Pittsburgh and nobody really cared about a plane that didn't cause any real damage. That sounds glib but it isn't; there was literally no coverage of that fourth flight and it was because, while it might normally be horrific, it was soothing to know that it hadn't hit anything but soft Earth.

But I have families in West Virginia. I didn't know if they were ok.

It only took a phone call to know that they were safe. Then I could breathe again, then I could settle myself. I have friends who weren't so lucky. They lost friends or family in the tragedies. So God Bless Me for having a safe family. God Bless Me for knowing that those close to me are ok.

Once I was assured of their safety, I fell back on the easiest emotion: anger. White-hot anger. Almost everywhere I turn, I get angry at the response to this horrible tragedy.

I was driving the other day and passed a fraternity house or a pseudo-fraternity house. In the front yard were guys with red cups no doubt topped off with kegged Milwaukee's Best Light. They were pointing at a sheet hanging from the house's second floor. "Honk if You Love America," it read. I didn't honk. Nobody did. And typical of the boys who lived there, they'd curse and jeer and throw some beers at those cars. God Bless those morons? God Bless these people who'd think it was appropriate to celebrate America by boozing on their front lawn?

In my house this past Monday, a visitor said if there were ever a reason to revoke the freedom of religion in this country, it was last week's attacks. He was frothing with hatred for all Muslims, and his companion said he'd definitely murder a celebrating Muslim if he got the chance. Suddenly, because we're viciously and suddenly attacked, we lose all perspective, all of the things that make this country so damned good? Our only guttural reaction to a horrible tragedy is to tread on those that might have been responsible, or at least those who look like the people who might have been responsible? God Bless those two, sitting around my kitchen table, playing cards?

Conservative websites have declared that everything short of Arab internment is necessary immediately. Some have gone so far as to suggest that Arab internment really wouldn't be that bad either. Jamie Glazov on www.frontpagemag.com honestly suggests that anybody who looks like Osama bin Laden should be immediately stopped and searched. Jerry Falwell claims it was the gays and the feminists and the ACLU who caused the New York City attacks, the "center of hedonism." Anne Coulter says that all Muslims should be bombed and, if not killed, converted to Christianity. God Bless any of these people, spitting venomous hatred like serpents?

And what of the liberals on this campus who saw this horrid tragedy as a chance to further their own argument that American foreign policy caused this? What of people who saw this as nothing more than an opportunity to wage a political war? At what point will some professors, supposedly so learned, have the subtlety to acknowledge that perhaps whoever did this are madmen, that no amount of coddling and comfort would change their hatred of this country? It is embarrassing to walk around campus and actually hear (or read) diatribes about America's guilt in all of this. Is our nation perfect? No. Has our foreign policy no doubt made us enemies throughout the world? Yes. Does that justify devastating acts against innocent individuals? No. And is this the time to point any of that out? Of course not. For God's sake, there are nearly 5,000 dead after these attacks and the best, most comforting thing that some of our peers and professors can come up with is 'we earned it?' It's shocking. And God has blessed these people?

Across the countries, Arabic peoples have been targeted in burnings and violence, slurs and epithets. Our own nation, who so desperately wants there to be a distinction between the innocent and the guilty, looks the other way at Muslims. Individuals who decry the innocence of the victims at the World Trade Center declare the guilt of Muslims for praying to Allah and not Jesus Christ. God Bless them?

It keeps going, with every politician who blindly calls for a war we cannot possibly win (or, who proposes that if we cannot win, we can use nuclear weapons), with every religious leader who finds a new person to blame, with every person that forgets about the thousands who died, every person who sees this horrible event as the stepping stone towards a world more like they'd like to see it.

Nobody's God can be blessing these people. They don't deserve the blessing, not now, not in the midst of their greed.

So who's left for a blessing?

The rescue workers spending so many hours searching, desperately, for a survivor trapped in the rubble.

The families that are holding out hope that their loved one still might emerge, still might appear on a hospital's roll, somewhere, anywhere.

The people standing in hours-long blood lines when the Red Cross has said that the blood isn't as needed as was originally thought; these people wanting to help in anyway, even if it means helping a hemophiliac in Idaho, so far removed from the tragedy.

The true triumph in all of this will hopefully be the continuance of everything that has made and continues to make America a great place to live. So often we ignore, in our haste to criticize our government from a leftist or rightist perspective, just how good we have it.

We have freedoms unknown to large tracts of the rest of the world. We have opportunities that are truly our own. We have so many things that so many others want. Last week's attacks might have threatened it, but we threaten it ourselves by being so flippant about what we have. It took a bombing to seemingly wake us up about everything that we might have lost; it took a day for us to forget about everything we always have. So God Bless Us everyone, and God Bless America.

Maybe.

Coming together

REGAN MCKENDRY

"I Pledge Allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America

And to the Republic for which it stands

One nation, Under God, Indivisible

With Liberty and Justice For All."

How many times have we uttered those words?

Personally, I know that I did every school day from September of 1986 right up through May of 1998. Sometimes they meant something, but more often than not, it was just another part of the school morning process, right along with listening to morning announcements and trying to finish last minute homework assignments. There wasn't anything special attached to the Pledge; it was just another 31 words, spoken at the same time every day.

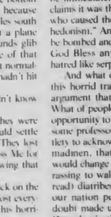
After last Tuesday's events, I was debating whether or not to go home this weekend. Part of me wanted to stay here with my friends and try to move forward, but part of me also wanted to escape from all the madness. In the end I decided that escape was the best way, so I went back to my hometown of the past 18 years.

On the drive home, there were constant reminders about what was going on in our country. People had American flags on their car antennae, and even larger ones on flagstaffs in the backs of pickups. Radio stations played tribute songs with clips from the media's coverage of Tuesday's attack. Every place I went, there was no place to turn to try to achieve a sense of normalcy.

That night at 7, the whole country was asked to participate in a candlelight vigil in remembrance of those who had died due to the terrorism. I went out on the porch with my little sister, each of us with a candle in hand. Most of our street did the same, in fact, both of us crossed the street to speak with some of our neighbors. After about ten minutes, people began to retreat back inside, my sister included.

As I headed back myself, though, I heard the honking of cars on Main Street (which is only three homes down from where I live). I walked down to talk with another one of my neighbors and found a crowd of about a dozen people standing on the street corner. All had candles and were waving to the cars that drove by, honking their horns in a show of patriotism. While I joined the festivities, I looked up and down the largest road in Haverhill and saw groups all along the sidewalks, holding candles, waving flags and cheering the cars that drove by with flags draped over their tops.

At one point three elementary school girls, who were standing next to me, began to recite the Pledge of Allegiance. As I listened to the innocence in their voice, saying those words I had spoken thousands of times before, I began to finally realize why I had been so troubled. I had tried to run away from all that was going on around me, when in actuality I should have been celebrating the outpouring of support. Over the past week, our country has come closer together than I have ever witnessed in my lifetime. People have celebrated remarkable solidarity in proclaiming their pride in being citizens of the greatest nation in the world.



We stayed out on Main Street for well over an hour, and even after I went inside, groups still remained with their candles alongside the road. The next two days at work, people all over the mall were walking around with red, white and blue ribbons. Even Sundas night, on my way home, I saw three girls standing alone with candles on the side of a rural road. And when I honked my horn for them, it was like Christmas morning in their eyes.

Many times pride in our country falls by the wayside as an unnecessary thing. People bitch more about what's wrong with our country than how privileged we all are to live in this great land. It's sad that a tragic event like this was required to bring out the sense of community we all know exists in America. More than likely, as time passes, people will once again neglect their American pride as unimportant. In those times, though, I'll continue to remember those three little girls who reminded me that there is nothing any one person or group can do to destroy American patriotism.

God Bless the USA.

Wide awake in America:
Life on the poverty line

MATTHEW DESPRES

"The 'working poor,' as they are approvingly termed, are in fact the major philanthropists of our society. They neglect their own children so that the children of others will be cared for; they live in substandard housing so that other homes will be shiny and perfect...to be a member of the working poor is to be an anonymous donor, a nameless benefactor, to everyone else."

– author Barbara Ehrenreich, Nickel and Dimed

Philanthropists, perhaps, but willing participants in the world of the anonymous working poor? Unlikely.

Ehrenreich's book has shed an enormous light on the working class of this society; most of us are that so-called 'working poor', earning a paycheck that cruelly mocks the time and effort spent earning it. Included in that time are the basic services for others she alludes to – the working class, after all, are working to make someone's life easier – but is that the motivation to be out in the trenches some forty-plus hours a week?

My own experience says no, and has never revealed someone with a genuine love of retail or other labor. We do it because we need it to live; at some point the freedom of having options is stripped away and we instinctively latch onto whatever's at hand, be it a "good" job or not. Although I could never sit here and pretend that the two years I spent working in retail as a footwear associate were difficult, I can never again belittle what was, for me, just a temporary job.

I was never once placed under great duress or strain, or forced to fight my own battles for a slight raise in pay. I didn't need the job to survive – for some thirty hours each week. It was a diversion, something to keep me out of the house. I took breaks, gave directions and simply did the job I had been hired to do – at my own discretion, at my own pace. The job boiled down to punching in, repeating the work from the previous shift and punching out. Little more was ever asked of me, because little else was ever required.

The relative comforts I arrived to most every day, however, did little to hide which way the tides were shifting elsewhere in the store – in the retail world, few things are kept hidden or below the scope of most employees for very long, if at all. From Lois, the fifty-something who secured our dressing room with every inch of her five-foot frame, to Ian, the Berkeley-educated guitarist with whom I shared many musical conversations, gossip flashed all around me like light, each spark sending off another misinformed tidbit through the air.

As part-timers, we were afforded this carefree nature – a built in warming track that allowed for mistakes without fear of repercussions. It was, after all, a turnstile sort of job, filled by students home for the summer and women driven out of the house by newly retired husbands. If the situation arose, other work could easily be obtained – this stop on the job trail was, except for a select few, a momentary pause. Nothing here was holding us back.

This freedom often clouded my view of what was really happening in the store, of those who depended on the bi-monthly paycheck to feed and clothe not only themselves, but often a wife and more than one child. It was a foreign concept to me; not frightening, at least not at the time, because they were merely co-workers: individuals I punched in with and occasionally sat beside in the upstairs break room. Time and circumstance insisted that our relationships progress no further; that we remain simply faces, bodies left to pick up a shift and a wayward item of clothing here and there.

Despite the walls placed by management, there was ample time to observe these people: slow periods that could be filled with the act of watching your fellow employee go about their day. Carlos, who spent the majority of his week unloading boxes of footwear and clothing in receiving, not only held my attention consistently, but also demanded it. His work ethic put us to shame, relegating what we considered a hard day's work into a mere precursor for his own day's activity.

With Carlos, like most of the full-time staff, it wasn't a cut-and-dry case of simply being passionate about the work, though he pretended to be and did it well. His motivation was pacing back and forth in Ladies & Kids, in the form of his wife, very pregnant with a young daughter already being provided for. As his shift would end at 4, she would arrive for hers, and, for a few minutes in the parking lot or in the shadows of a clothing rack, they could be a family. Spend time together that otherwise couldn't be afforded – not at home, and certainly not during the day. By working to support his family, the man hardly ever got to be a part of it.

> "Although I could never sit here and pretend that the two years I spent working in retail as a footwear associate were difficult, I can never again belittle what was, for me, just a temporary job."

The complaining I had done seemed selfish now. Hadn't I received a dollar raise in pay for simply coming back for the summer? Wasn't I allowed days off in the late stretch of August, when time off was forbidden due to the enormous back-to-school rush? Hadn't I been granted free license over my schedule, allowed to craft it in whatever was suited me best? The job was static, sure, but I was getting paid to come in and write my own rules – rules that affected my own person, and not a hungry wife and child. The whining slowed considerably after watching Carlos weave his pattern everyday, an intricate design leading to an honorable goal.

He was one of the few full-timers that I spoke with, that considered me a peer and not an interchangeable piece that begged for replacement. The conversation was never long and seldom far-reaching, but it was honest, and that dose of reality in an otherwise empty situation turned my head. He took the positive of every angle, the side of every argument that somehow worked in his favor. He showed up everyday, punched his card, and played his role, a part whose significance I had never considered.

I met his daughter just once, parading through the store on the day that Carlos become a new father for the second time. They had come to share the happiness that often arrives with an infant son, and as she walked past, I looked down and heard, "You're Matt." I agreed, knowing she had read the name off of my ID tag, but like her father the gesture was genuine in it's attempt to spread the feeling she had inside. Reaching up as far as her toes would allow, she added, "My dad loves us."

I had no doubt that he did.

Craig David brings U.K. Garage To the U.S. with some success

By Kurt Polesky
Collegian Staff

CRAIG DAVID
Born To Do It
Atlantic Records

Not to put too much pressure on him, but Craig David was supposed to be the "next big thing" in American music. At least according to record executives and radio types clamoring for a new superstar, just in case the public's love for the current crop of popstars begins to waver. Elton John even proclaimed him "the best singer England has seen in years."

So who is this Craig David guy anyway? He has been one of the biggest selling acts on a worldwide basis for the past several years, and has even able to accomplish the daunting task of filling arenas by himself in Europe. The 20-year-old Southampton, England native has been one of Britain's premier performers of a type of music – called "U.K Garage" – that has become both the club and pop music of choice for many in England.

To most ears, the U.K. garage sound will sound a whole lot like the exact same R&B/pop that has dominated American music and radio these past few years. However, listening closely does reveal some obvious differences between his sound and the Backstreet Boys of the world. The Garage sound, noted for its quick and jumpy "two-step" drum beats behind R&B beats, does have both a more club and street feel than standard American pop. The beats are such that the song always sounds upbeat regardless of its lyrical tone. As a result, the songs possess a far more danceable edge than most R&B.

This is apparent in the album opening, and first U.S. single, "Fill Me In." The track could be a follow up to Jon's hit "Stutter," as David tells the story of him getting played by his girl of the moment. The likes of R. Kelly or Usher would likely turn this theme into some overpowering ballad, but David managed to turn it into an exceedingly catchy R&B number, that relies on his lyrical skills rather than heavy crooning as many R&B'ers do.

While David separates himself from the pack at times on the album, he also falls into the poseur trap that so many R&B acts do, with his use of urban street slang and "playa" attitude. Not that it automatically detracts from his overall sound, but it does lump him with the rest of the R&B pack, rather than as something unique, as he is sometimes heralded as. He "gets jiggy with it" in "Rendezvous," and even tells us to "throw our hands in the air, and...." well you know the rest. He also is self-congratulatory to his skills in bed throughout the album. In "Follow Me" he tells us to follow him to his bedroom, "When he'll get on top and make it real hot," and, of course, "you tell me don't stop." Of course not, playa.

While some of the cliché boastiality grows tiresome, Born To Do It does succeed in two main areas. Most notably, David does feature a decent storytelling element to many of his songs, even if the story is rather elementary, and has been told a thousand times before. Also, the production is solid, and the beats flow fluently from start to finish. The songs where these two areas meet are quite obviously where the album hits its peak.

"7 days," the story of the first week of David's relationship (that of course, included sex after just 3 days) is one of these moments where lyrics and beats come together, even if the hook is a bit silly. Same goes for "Last Night," that tells of David's club hopping exploits.

In other tracks, everything doesn't come together as well, as the lyrics are often simplistic and predictable. Still even when David doesn't have too much of interest to say, allowing his voice (which is hardly distinctive) to flow behind the beats rather than the other way around, enhances the album. At it's best, the album provides some excellent R&B songs, and at its worst it still provides some cool-sounding beats. Overall, there isn't much variety in the tracks as none defeat from the garage sound. About the only difference is that some feature more acoustic guitar or more strings than others.

Craig David certainly isn't going to revolutionize American pop music as some might have thought. Still, he manages to fuse elements of R&B, dance, hip-hop and soul into a sound that is certainly more advanced than the majority of his pop/R&B counterparts.

Sobieski elevates solid thriller

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Correspondent

THE GLASS HOUSE
Directed by Daniel Sackheim
Starring Leelee Sobieski, Stellan Skarsgaard, Diane Lane and Trevor Morgan
Playing at CineMark 12

The Glass House is a creepy and efficient thriller that never ends up as good as it could be, despite the polish and skill that is brought to a film that could have been nothing but an exercise.

Leelee Sobieski – who is one of our best young actresses, even when cast in pseudo-romantic glop like Here on Earth – stars as Ruby Baker, an ordinarily rebellious teen and aspiring artist. When her parents tragically die in a car crash, she and her little brother Rhett (Trevor Morgan) are sent to live with Terry and Erin Glass (Stellan Skarsgaard and Diane Lane), former neighbors now living in Malibu. The Glasses are seemingly perfect guardians, an affluent couple (he owns a limo service, she's a doctor) who pick up the kids in one of Terry's limos and live in a post-modern, cliffside home constructed of glass, concrete and stainless steel. The Glasses are the kind of couple – and the house the kind of impersonally hip abode – that suggest things are to good to be true, and Ruby begins to suspect things about her new guardians as she begins to uncover seemingly dark secrets.

For a long while, The Glass House is a sublimely creepy little thriller that could honestly be deemed neo-Hitchcockian. Screenwriter Wesley Strick and director Daniel Sackheim (a veteran of TV shows like The X-Files) keep the film pleasingly ambiguous, playing with the audience's expectations rather than spoon-feeding trite Hollywood cliches. Are Ruby and Rhett really in danger, or is Ruby just overreacting after her parents' death? Is Erin really diabetic, or is she really dipping into the medical bag for a fix? Could Terry be a dangerous lech, or is he a concerned guardian? Who are those men, exactly, calling him on the phone? The pleasure of the movie is that the audience is allowed to think for itself. Even when the movie makes the inevitable decline into the explicit confirmation of Ruby's fears, it retains an ominous force – Ruby can't get anyone to believe her, and is stymied at all turns in her quest to prove the truth.

It's after this that The Glass House begins to falter, lapsing into standard thriller mechanics. After the tense buildup, Sackheim and Strick let the film collapse into obvious conventions – car chases, guns hidden behind the back, the bad guy who isn't really dead. It isn't bad exactly, and it is done with a degree of intelligence, but it's lamentable that a film made with such verve could still lose the courage of its convictions in the final act.

There are those who could write off The Glass House as another asinine teen/exploitation thriller, but this film was made with a proficiency lacking in most of the recent "teen" films. Sobieski earned her first million-dollar paycheck here, and deserves every penny of it. She nicely underplays her role as a grieving teen, and gives Ruby an emotional depth that would be lacking in a more generic starlet. Skarsgaard, too, is sensational, cementing his status as one of our best character actors (his credits range from Good Will Hunting to Deep Blue Sea) as Terry. He lets us glimpse the building rage and panicked terror under the character's intelligent, charming facade. It's nice to see Bruce Dern (as a family lawyer) again, but Lane is given little to do, just as in the recent Hartlball.

Sackheim has mounted a handsome production and his stylish direction, full of foreboding shadows, gives the movie a menacing air. Strick's screenplay is also a credit, because it never gets dumb, even when it becomes conventional. As for the home, the coolly impersonal interiors were built on a set (give a hand to the production designer), while the exterior does exist (the impressive structure was designed by architects Hugo Belzberg and George Daniel Wittman).

University Gallery showcases the intricacies of Space, big and small

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

The concept of space is a broad, all-encompassing topic. It cannot be easily defined. Yet artists have always tried to define their physical and psychological space, attempting to understand both their outer and inner landscapes.

The current exhibit at the University Gallery titled Space displays some examinations of this topic by modern and contemporary artists. Pieces from the Gallery's permanent collection were selected for this exhibit. The various mediums shown here are a testament to both the importance of this topic to so many artists, and also the University's collection itself.

One of the most familiar looking examinations of space is a lithograph by the American artist Sylvia Plimack Mangold. Her lithograph, "View of Schnumemunk Mountain," from 1980, depicts a scene that everyone is this area is accustomed to seeing. That is, the view of mountains in the distance. Mangold uses a traditional view here, by placing the viewer at a point in the foreground.

SPACE
COURTESY OF UNIVERSITY GALLERY

Al Souza's "packing a can of sardines" from 1976 explores the epitome of small space.

The mountains and sky are dark. It is a night scene, punctuated with unidentified points of light, our only indication that this is probably a modern scene. But this is a space that we must confront everyday, as we look out of our windows or step outside: our relationship to nature in the distance, and to the mountains that have become background for many of us. And in turn, their relation to the rest of nature, represented here the large expanse of dark sky. We are small and only an observer in the grand scale of nature.

The American Al Souza's 1976 piece "Packing a can of sardines" is a series of nine color photographs examining what may be the most cliched symbol of small space. But, through these photographs, which begin with a tiny empty can and end with a packed and closed one, we see the transformation of a space. Something that was empty is now full. Space is defined here by the filling of that emptiness.

One of the bigger names represented in the collection, Gerhard Richter, the German Pop artist, has examined space and shadow in "Shattenbild I." The piece contains a white geometric figure in the foreground. It is central to the work, which perhaps in other circumstances would have made it the most important figure.

But Richter's figure casts a shadow. The figure looks as if it is upright in a room. The shadow falls on the floor behind it, and crawls up the wall. This shadow is the most intriguing part of this work. It is the domineering figure.

This space is most prominently filled with something that, for all intents and purposes, does not really exist. Moreover, the space seems to be enclosing this white figure. The viewer is right on top of it, and the wall it right behind it. Its own shadow is imposing on it. Richter's space is one that can enclose, and one that is most significantly filled with something without substance.

American photographer Mark Klett investigates small, naturally created spaces, in comparison with large natural expanses in three separate pieces in this show.

These small spaces are analogous to homes. Whether they reference modern homes or ancient cave dwellings, they call to mind safe spaces. But immediately outside is nature in all of its bigness.

The photographs were taken in Idaho, in both snow and sun. Perhaps the most intriguing of the pictures is an untitled from 1981. It is taken from inside an ice cavern, which opens to the snow-covered mountains and sky. Though this cavern is small and inviting, there is also an undeniably strange nature to it. When examined outside of its context, the cave is akin to a moonscape, with smooth jewels of ice filling the space.

Joseph Cornell, another one of the Gallery's big names, is famous for his explorations of space. The American artist created boxes, and filled these spaces with objects.

It's extraordinary how this small space captivates and pulls you into this world. The work's title, "Hotel," is displayed on a small sign inside. The sign is small, hidden, and covered with paint, sadly advertising the space.

The inside is covered with cracked white paint, and in the center is a window. The window is cracked as well. The curving lines that result from the break are sadly beautiful. This sad but beautiful quality pervades the piece.

It holds the commonality and homogeneousness of hotels: the neutrally colored walls and basic window. It is familiar. In the way all hotels are familiar to us. But this is unique in that each paint and window crack tells a story of the abandonment of this space, and its final isolation.

Cornell's interest in space and what defines that space can be taken as the example for the whole exhibit. Our relationships to the world may be measured in such spaces.

Space will be on exhibit until Oct. 26 at the University Gallery in the Fine Arts Center.

Michelle Branch bombards the senses with her psychedelic El Paso hip-hop

The Spirits Within: Branch A self-made success story

By Shauna Billings

MICHELLE BRANCH
The Spirit Room
Maverick Recording Company

We live in a world where prepackaged music groups like the Backstreet Boys and O-Town are kings. Amidst the shrieks of tube-topped adolescent girls, Nick and Kevin (of the Bert uni-brow) belt out carelessly crafted and grammatically gruesome lyrics like, "I don't care what he does to make you smile/Does his gifts come from the heart." And what do these songs, that make editors and English teachers alike shake their heads in disgust, receive as a reception? Number one debuts on TRL and triple- quadruple platinum albums. And don't even get me started on the half-dozen bleached blond girls who have to lip-synch through their concerts.

I am happy to announce, that there is at least one teenaged singer of our generation who writes or collaborates on ALL her songs, plays her own guitar, and may (gasp!) actually sport her natural hair color.

Michelle Branch's debut album, The Spirit Room, contains laid back melodies and insightful lyrics. Five of the eleven songs of the album were written solely by Branch – and all vocals (lead and backup) are hers. AND she not only plays the guitar; she even plays keyboard on some of her songs.

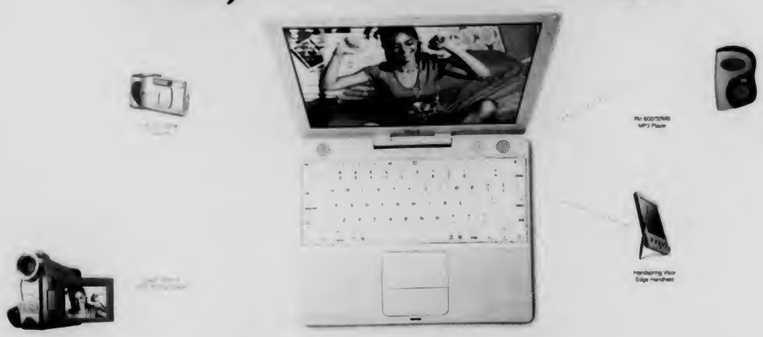
Please excuse my enthusiasm – it's just that the first release of her album, "Everywhere" debuted on TRL's top ten, and has remained on the list for the past month. I didn't think that anyone who voted for songs actually cared about a real artist. Or maybe they don't care – they just thought the song was catchy.

"Everywhere" which has received massive radio airtime, is a very catchy song. It has a quick beat - the kind that promotes head bobbing, for those of you who like to lean against walls and nod to the music (i.e. 8 out of 10 guys at any dancing venue). And Branch's voice soars with heartfelt emotion and an innocent clarity.

"You Get Me" could pretty much be the theme song of any fellow quirky individual. "So I'm a little left of center/ I'm a little out of tune/ Some say I'm paranormal/ So I just bend their spoon." It speaks to me, although I'm not sure that the Backstreet backers would quite understand the reference to telekinesis.

For all those girls sick and tired of being rescued, and waiting for your "Dreamlover <to> come and rescue <you>" (thanks to the brilliant minds of Mariah Carey's writers), "All You Wanted" can be your new anthem. It's all about the girl saving the guy. And I say it's about time.

All the songs have a casual feel and just flow from one to another. Yet, it doesn't get tiresome listening to the CD. And as someone who gets easily bored with the same artist for the length of a CD, it takes a lot to keep my attention. All vocals on the album are Branch, so the harmonies are the rich blending of the same voice – a very soothing sound.



Lyrics like "She's his yellow brick road/ Leading him on/ And letting him go..." and "You know that silence is loud when all/ You hear is your heart," make Michelle Branch a candidate for the soundtrack to this season's Dawson's Creek episodes. She has all those deep thoughts wrapped up in that casual American Eagle rugby shirt feel that the music producers seem to love.

The songs written solely by Branch have a unique feel – "Sweet Misery" starts off with an altered Calypso beat, while "If Only She Knew," a song about still loving someone, touches the tension and restraint felt in such a situation.

The final song on the CD, "Drop in the Ocean" is my favorite. You won't see it on MTV, with its intro of slightly discordant church bells. The song slowly becomes more uptempo, as her guitar strums, then beats add to the bell background. The song builds and builds, as she sings "Nothing has been as beautiful/ As when I saw heaven's skies/ In your eyes." Then the song fades away to distant marimba plunks and bell tolls, and then silence as the CD stops spinning. You actually sit there wishing there were just one more song – a hidden one after the last track. But I guess we'll just have to wait for Branch's next release. For anyone her age with such real talent is certain to have another album soon.

Hardball inexplicably fun

By Jake D. Lewis
Collegian Staff

HARDBALL
Starring Keanu Reeves and Diane Lane
Directed by Brian Robbins
Playing at CineMark 12 in Hadley

Sometimes it's hard to figure out why you like a movie. Even after you give it a lot of thought you still come up blank as to why it registered a certain way with you. It's not as though the acting is very good, nor is the script all too creative, but nonetheless, you still leave the theatre saying that you enjoyed what you just saw.

One must realize at times like this that some movies don't have the intention of wowing you with its acting or bringing to life a never-before-seen story. Instead, the goals of such films are to simply entertain you for two hours. Nothing more, nothing less.

The new Keanu Reeves film Hardball is such an example where nothing extraordinary stands out about it, but that is not a deterrent from liking it. Reeves plays Connor O'Neil, a bookie that is down on his luck and deep in debt. His best friend offers him $500 a week to take over coaching responsibilities of a little League team in Chicago's projects areas, a job he only took on so he could "give back to the community," Reeves reluctantly agrees.

The bunch of tykes who make up the team are both a laugh-riot to watch on the screen and emotionally endearing, especially when they banter back and forth with today's modern street-slang expressions. Each kid has their own charming personality, like the pitcher who can only throw well when he's listening to The Notorious B.I.G.'s "Big Poppa" on his headphones. Racial tensions soon flare when an opposing team's coach, who is white by the way, tells him to discard the headphones since they're a "safety hazard." This affects the kid's pitching, but later on, the crowd erupts into a chorus of "Big Poppa" and he finally gets his groove back. It's cheesy, it's cliche, but it works. The same evil coach also discovers that one player, Jamal, is too young to play in the league. Jamal wants to belong to something so greatly that he gives up the colors of his baseball team for those of a gang, another sort of team where he can feel like he fits in. This results in a predictable yet tragic moment at film's end, showing that the filmmakers will not conform to the stereotypical family film formula.

Diane Lane plays the schoolteacher of the boys on the team, who will not let one of the boys, Kofi, play on the team unless he reads the book A Wrinkle In Time for class. When it comes time for Kofi to report to class what he thought about the book, he says it's unrealistic because "Where I'm from, no one's father bothers coming back." You don't have to have read the novel to understand the poignant message found here. O'Neil's eyes are opened as he understands that he serves as a father figure to Kofi and all the other boys as well. It is circumstances like this that establish the coach-to-kid connection that is expected but also so heartwarming. In The Mighty Ducks, for example, that same bonding is only a result of the dynamic relationship the coach has with the players in the game. But in Hardball, O'Neil forms the relationship with the kids because he gets a glimpse into their personal lives, like when he walks a kid home and sees the project in which he lives. It's a far more realistic and moving formula. The movie is not as much about the game of baseball as it instead concentrates on what makes a team strong.

Hardball was originally given an R rating, but was later reduced to PG-13 so the target audience, families, could go see it. Even so, it is still profanity-laden and filled with a few violent scenes. In such a scene early on in the film, O'Neil keeps the kids late since he awaits his business partner's arrival. As a result, one of the players is brutally attacked and hospitalized. It's questionable, though, how a child watching this would react to this scene and others like it. While this scene adds more of a feel of the dangerous atmosphere that the film is set in as well as emotional character development, it might be too fear provoking for younger audiences.

Hardball is a fitting addition to the sports film genre, as well as a refreshing film in this otherwise dreary fall season. It will almost certainly make you laugh, perhaps make you cry, but at the very least, keep you entertained.

Keanu Reeves stars in Hardball, an IMAX documentary dealing with the evils of whale hunting.

Winter games will see protests

By Wynne Parry
Daily Utah Chronicle (U. Utah)

(U-WIRE) SALT LAKE CITY – Politics and the Olympics are inseparable. But their entanglement in 2002 appeared foreboding in light of last week's terrorist attack.

In response, potential Olympic protestors emphasized the distinction between peaceful, legal protest and terrorism at a public forum held Friday evening in the Marriott Library.

"It's like comparing apples and oranges," said Glenn Hines, a speaker and the executive director of Crossroads Urban Center. "The right to protest is easily lost if not exercised."

Last week, Bailey heard the president refer to the United States as a beacon of freedom.

"I highly agree," he said. "Yes, we do need to fight for freedom."

Bailey said when they arrive in 2002, the Games will be an ideal opportunity to draw attention to child welfare, poverty, the environment or any of a rainbow of issues. About two weeks ago, Hines, a member of the Student Green Party, requested space to stage a protest near Carlson Hall in the Union. Protesters hope to use the site to condemn the Olympics' corporatization by staging a mock torch run. The torchbearer will be weighed down with name-brand shoes, soft drinks, fast food and other products. University of Utah administrators are still somewhat unsure of how to handle her application.

"Nobody has any idea of the process to do this, because we're the first group to apply for a permit," she said.

The Student Green Party's plans are interwoven with those of the Utah Citizen Activist Network, a coalition of independent local groups. Both organizations sponsored Friday's forum. Under normal circumstances, the Scheduling Office takes requests for space, though that process is undergoing some revision. This winter, the Salt Lake Organizing Committee will assume control of parts of the campus, however, throwing a few kinks into the process that administrators have yet to straighten out, according to Gwen Springmeyer, the associate director of Olympic Coordination.

"It's a matter of deciding who will make which decisions when," she said. "I cannot imagine a scenario when someone will be told no, unless it's a safety issue."

Pete van der Have, chairman of the Olympic Operations Committee, does not believe the process should change much.

"The Olympics are just another event," he said.

Despite the delay, Hines feels the University has been responsive. "I feel that this will be a lot smoother process than in the city," Hines said. "They're actually showing interest in letting people express their First Amendment rights."

She expressed frustration with the heavy restrictions placed on protest areas in Salt Lake City. Because of the constraints and the city's unresponsiveness, the American Civil Liberties Union has become involved.

While recent events may not have cast protests in the friendliest light, local culture has never welcomed them anyway.

"In Utah, people are irrationally afraid of protests," Bailey said. "It's something they don't really understand."

Several participants questioned the wisdom of holding the Olympics after last week's terrorist attacks. The Olympics have posted a great big target on Salt Lake City, said Steve Pace, director of Utahans for Responsible Public Spending. He said SLOC's security plans are woefully inadequate.

He suggested delaying the Olympics or relying more heavily on television broadcasts in lieu of attracting crowds of visitors.

Snap, crackle, pop?

Joint problems plague students

By Jeremy Slick
Badger Herald (U. Wisconsin)

(U-WIRE) MADISON, Wis. – Many of us wake in the morning, slowly roll out of bed and begin to crack most of the joints in our body. They are stiff from the previous day's trek around campus and other activities. You feel old when your knees make a loud crack after getting up from a power lecture.

Unfortunately, you realize that it will only get worse with age. Although many people are unaware, there are procedures that can easily help with the pain caused by aching joints.

Osteoarthritis, a chronic disease causing deterioration of the joint cartilage and other joint tissues with the formation of new bone (bone spurs) at the margins of the joints, affects half the population over the age of 65. Although we often hear of the problem plaguing the elderly, students also feel the effects.

Doctor Edmund Markey, of the State Medical Society of Wisconsin, said that the problem may only get worse.

Luckily, there are many cures available for osteoarthritis.

"There are now many relatively easy procedures that can substantially improve one's quality of life due to an arthritic knee, or hip, or ankle or toe," said Markey.

These cures range from oral medication to surgery on the afflicted area. Surgery time can be as short as 15 minutes, and usually requires general or regional anesthesia. The price can range from about $500 to a few thousand dollars.

If you believe that you may have some form of osteoarthritis, it is recommended that you see a doctor.

"Use your judgment," said Mark Aschliman, an orthopedic surgeon in private practice. "Don't go in too quickly, but if you feel that the pain constitutes medical attention, then go and see a doctor."

The sooner you address the problem, the easier it will be to cure.

"Rarely is it too late to have such a condition treated in this fashion, but it may become more difficult with deformity or bone loss," Marky said.

University of Wisconsin professor Gregory Landry, a sports-medicine specialist, said that fear is one of the major reasons for people neglecting medical attention.

"They fear surgery will be recommended or they will be told to stop the activities that they want to do," according to Landry.

He also said that it is usually harder to convince men to seek attention.

Specialists recommend the same general tips to avoid osteoarthritis: stretch before working out, do not concentrate your activity to just the weekend, have a routine schedule through the week and just be careful. Some problems cannot be avoided due to genetics, but by taking care and watching for symptoms, one can avoid most problems.

If you do believe that you are having problems, it is recommended that you seek medical attention so that the problem can easily be remedied.

Laws governing agents yet to pass in many states

By Pete Iorizzo
Daily Orange (Syracuse U.)

(U-WIRE) SYRACUSE, N.Y. – They lurk in dark corners before the ball is tipped or kicked off. If you look closely, the shadowy figures often remain visible after the final buzzer. Their soft voices whispering of wealth and fame can lure a collegiate star like the sirens lured Odysseus.

Preston Shumpert has yet to hear the voices, but he knows sports agents tiptoe about campus – careful not to get too close, but equally careful not to let him out of their sight. New York State has yet to pass the Uniform Athlete Agents Act, legislation protecting student-athletes against agents.

"It's a lot of temptation," Shumpert said. "One thing you want to do is play for love of the game, but part of it is for the money. As much as somebody might say, 'No, I'm not playing for the money,' so much money is being offered to players that it causes guys to leave early. It's going to keep continuing."

Recognizing this trend, universities across the country, in cooperation with the NCAA, are pressuring state lawmakers to pass legislation protecting athletes. Twenty-eight states currently have some laws monitoring agent behavior, but New York State has none.

Because of disparities in state laws and because states like New York have no laws, the NCAA drafted the UAAA, which 11 states have passed.

THE LAW

Four years ago, deep inside some NCAA thinktank, the idea emerged for a uniform act protecting athletes from agents. Three years later, the UAAA was drafted, and by July 1, 2000, three states had passed the act.

Indiana was among the first, and state Attorney General Steve Carter enforces the law he supported as soon as the NCAA proposed it.

"I know some athletes have been confused and uncertain about how to deal with agents who approach them during the school term," Carter said. "The universities have indicated to me that it's been a distraction for the athletes to be approached in this way.

"When you see in the last NBA draft, four of the top six picks were kids coming directly out of high school, you see the professional ranks and therefore agents lining up with interest in athletes at a much earlier age. So to some extent, this is a proactive move prior to any large scale problems, but we have had reports of incidents that lead us to believe that this is the right way to go."

The NCAA intends to protect athletes by curbing agent activity from several angles. According to the UAAA, athletes have the right to void any contract with an agent within 14 days after the contract has been signed. Agents can be required to register with states and provide background about themselves, giving athletes the opportunity to learn more about agents who approach them. Agents who fail to comply are subject to civil and criminal penalties.

The registration process has been perhaps the biggest reason why agents fail to comply with regulations already in place. Twenty-eight states have laws governing agents, but the regulations differ from state to state and some are rather vague, NCAA consultant Lisa Dehon said.

"Agents would have to comply with 28 different laws and register in 28 states," Dehon said. "We wanted to make it a streamline process to make registering easy."

Because of the number of states in which they have to register, registration fees for an agent can reach $150,000 per year, said agent Harold Lewis, who represents former Syracuse University linebacker Morlon Greenwood. Most agents want to be able to register in one state, for one fee, with one set of laws, Lewis added.

Lewis said the actions of some agents put a "bad stigma" over the industry as a whole. If laws made it easier for agents to register and comply, the image of the business might be improved.

"We're for anything hurting the bad guys who don't follow the rules," agent R.J. Gonzer said, "and for helping the guys who follow the rules." Dehon said in addition to having agents follow the rules, athletes need to become acquainted with their rights. They need to investigate the agents who approach them and ask more questions, a process that would be made easier by the UAAA.

"The registration process requires you to provide information about yourself," said Dehon, who worked for the NCAA for nine years. "One of the problems with agents is often times you really don't know who you're dealing with. We need our student-athletes to ask more questions for people who are willing to buy them things and give them things."

While Indiana has yet to register any agents, Attorney General Carter remains optimistic they will comply.

"Most of them want to act in a responsible manner," Carter said. "When most of them realize they are subject to civil and criminal penalties, they'll comply with the act."

BACK HOME

New York's inability to protect its athletes has not gone unnoticed by the SU community. For two years, Beth Rougeux, director of state relations for the university, has been pressuring state lawmakers in Albany to pass legislation protecting athletes.

A version of the UAAA is in both the state senate and assembly. In the senate, the bill reached the floor, but legislators failed to act on it by the end of session. In the assembly, the bill remains in the hands of the Tourism, Arts and Sports Development committee.

Dan Kinley, director of legislation in Albany, does not expect a vote on the bill in either house before January.

The delays resulted from disagreements between lawmakers and university officials about the wording of the bill. A potential compromise concerns SU Director of Athletics Jake Crouthamel.

"We have a bill that was presented initially to the state that has still not been acted on and has been watered down considerably," Crouthamel said. "This is kind of what happens today when you go through government processes."

But Rougeux remains confident the bill can have the desired effect.

"We feel that the act does still have strong enough penalties to be a viable piece of legislation," she said. "It's a consumer protection bill for the students."

As SU waits for action by lawmakers, it can do little to protect athletes besides educate them about agents, Crouthamel said. The university has in place a sports career-counseling panel to advise students if they seek help.

While agents with motives have yet to surface on the Syracuse campus, Crouthamel knows they could be hiding around the corner, calling softly to the athletes dressed in orange and blue.

"There are some runners around here," he said, "and when we hear of that we try to shoo them off, so they won't contact kids in their rooms. We haven't experienced a specific problem, but that doesn't mean that there is not a problem lurking out there."

Quote of the Day

"We normal human beings are constantly exposed to the zero-fat mutants in the media, and we naturally assume that we're supposed to look like them. This is of course impossible, but we try. We diet constantly, especially young women, many of whom now start dieting in the womb."

–Dave Barry

Horoscopes

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) — Be understanding and sympathetic at all times today. You can't afford to make anyone you encounter defensive or distant. Ergo, therein lies the crux.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) — The Rob Schultze Theory: Madam Cleo is just Sammy Sosa in drag. Live by it.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) — Sympathy and a willingness to lend a hand go a long way today. You may surprise your critics by being far more cooperative than expected. You are a strong man! You are a strong man!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) — The war between the sexes is far from over, but you may be able to score a minor but remarkable victory in a current skirmish. Go to the frats this weekend!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) — Your marital status may be changing very soon unless you are quick to take steps that can avoid any development that doesn't suit your needs. The Collegian suggests a prenuptial agreement.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) — You'll receive an invitation that holds a great deal of promise — but the real wallop is sure to come when you least expect it. Just remember, those Publisher's Clearing House letters from Ed McMahon are a total sham!

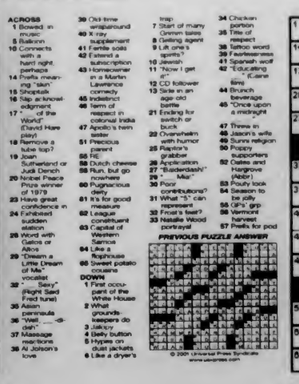
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) — Your inner rhythms are just as important as those external forces that are always exerting pressure on you day after day. Even though it is difficult at times, make sure you stay inside the lines when coloring in your Snoopy coloring book.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) — Keep your criticisms in line today, and be sure that you're focusing on those things on which you can actually have a positive effect. Complaining about the color of the sky probably won't change anything.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) — Once you begin behaving out of character today, you're likely to lose much of the advantage you've worked for in the recent past. You have to stop that ridiculous impression of Billy Madison. You're not fooling anyone.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) — You are likely to be ahead of the game today, but you mustn't let yourself become lazy or complacent. When you miss the trash barrel for the twelfth time today, the next time just walk over and toss it in.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) — You may be racing the clock as well as your opponents today, but you can rise to the occasion and prove your full potential at this time. Go to Hollywood and try to stop the movie that is being made about you and your silent sidekick, Snoochie Boochies.



LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) — You may have to be on the move at a moment's notice today, so you must be able to rely on your previous preparations. You know, like all those cigarettes you smoked while drinking.

Santos, Lilly take A-10 weekly honors

By Justin Pearson
Collegian Staff

Following their 6-2 victory over Binghamton University at Totman Field on Sunday, a pair of UMass women's soccer players picked up Atlantic 10 awards on Monday.

Sophomore forward Erin Lilly tallied the game-winning goal and an assist in the victory en route to winning the Co-Player of the Week award. Sharing the award with Lilly was Elizabeth Frengs, a junior midfielder from Temple who scored the winning goal in the Owls' 3-1 win over Virginia Commonwealth.

Stephanie Santos, a freshman from Ludlow, picked up her first ever collegiate hat trick leading to her selection as the A-10 Rookie of the Week. Santos tallied twice in the first half and finished off the hat trick with a shot that found its way just under the crossbar in the 59th minute. The last Minutewoman to record a hat trick was mldfielder Katelyn Jones who scored three times in the first half against Temple back on October 8th of last season.

Santos also picked up the WHMP/UMass Athlete of the Week Award for her performance against the Bearcats.

"It was good to see our frontrunners get some points out there," said UMass Coach Jim Rudy following Sunday's match.

Sunday's match looked good from the start as the Minutewomen were able to apply constant pressure to the Bearcat back line and in turn were able to create several chances early on. But it wasn't until the 27th minute that the breakthrough would come and it came through Santos. She showed poise and pace to get behind the Binghamton defense and place her shot beyond the dive of the goalkeeper and into the back of the net.

Just six minutes later Santos doubled the lead as she converted an easy chance off Martha Conover's misfired volley.

Then it was Lilly's time to step up and she did not disappoint. First she fired a low right-footed shot that caromed off the inside of the post with the keeper beat and soon after went one better as she scored off a feed from Kat Machmer with just 22 seconds left before halftime to seal the victory.

"It's a nice combo," said Rudy of his attacking tandem. "You have Erin as a sophomore playing as an older, experienced woman and Stephanie the young kid who at times plays like a senior, it's quite encouraging."

While their coach was quick to praise the young strikers, Lilly and Santos were quite humble upon receiving their honors.

"It was exciting [to win the award] but It's more of a team thing for me," said Lilly, a native of Ballston Lake, N.Y. "I'm not the kind of person who gets excited for individual stuff like this, but my dad's excited."

"It was shocking to win it," said Santos. "But I'm excited and kind of happy about it."

The Minutewomen return to action on Sunday afternoon when they play host to the University of Rhode Island in their first A-10 conference match. The Minutewomen will go into the game on a high following last Sunday's result, a feeling that Lilly hopes will carry over to the remaining 13 games of the season.

"There's just a different feeling after Sunday's win," she said. "We had a really good preseason but the loss to UConn really set us back. It was important to get a win, especially at Totman, and now It's exciting and fun to play again. It's all coming together."

MEN'S SOCCER

After cancellation of last weekend's UMass Classic and the game that was to replace it, the Massachusetts men's soccer team (2-2) will finally return to the pitch this afternoon at New Hampshire.

Ten days removed from a thrilling 2-1 overtime win over Boston University, UMass will look to eclipse the .500 mark for the first time In the early goings of the 2001 campaign.

Junior Jeff Deren scored last Sunday's game-winner in the 111th minute and was named WHMP/UMass Player of the Week for his efforts.

WATER POLO

The College Water Polo Association (CWPA) Northern Division named Massachusetts senior Greg Trayer as its Player of the Week Tuesday, for the week of Sept. 12.

The Reading, Pa. native scored 13 goals in four wins at the Harvard Invitational for the No. 13 Minutemen.

On Sept. 8, the Maroon and White (8-1) dropped Iona 11-3, and MIT 17-4. Later that day, UMass edged out No. 20 Harvard in triple overtime. In that contest, Trayer tallied six times for the streaking Minutemen.

"Greg had a great weekend," head coach Russ Yarworth said. "He helped lead the team to four key wins."

In a total of 30 quarters this season, Trayer has found the goal 19 times and assisted on four others, for a team-leading 23 points. His .704 shooting percentage is also tops on the team.

UMass travels to Cambridge again next Saturday for league battles with Boston College, along with MIT and Harvard for the second time this season.

FIELD HOCKEY

The Massachusetts field hockey team will take on No. 4 Michigan on Friday, Sept. 21 at 4 p.m. and Indiana the following day at 11 a.m. A minor change In scheduling, the Michigan game was initially lined up for Sunday, Sept. 23, but was changed for travel purposes.

The Minutewomen are 1-2 so far in the 2001 campaign. Michigan is 4-2 on the season and Indiana is 0-3.

WOMEN'S TENNIS

Massachusetts women's tennis coach Judy Dixon announced Monday that yesterday's scheduled match with Amherst College will be moved to Tuesday, Sept. 25 at 3:30 p.m. The match will be played at the Upper Boyden Courts.

Coming off of a 20-8 season with a trip to the NCAA Tournament in 2000-01, the Minutewomen will open up this year's campaign this weekend at the Eastern Collegiate Tournament.

After tragedy... an uncertain future?

SCOTT ELDRIDGE/COLLEGIAN

Students stare in silence as events unravel before them.

By Jennifer Eastwood and Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts, as well as much of the nation, stopped to watch or listen to the almost unbelievable scenes that unfolded before them on television screens and radio stations on September 11th.

Some people, worried about friends or families, reached for phones, hopeful of hearing from those they knew who might have been a victim of the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Others worried about those who might have been victims of the hijackings and destruction of four commercial airliners. Others were frozen in time, wondering who could do such acts and why and what will happen now.

In response, the University of Massachusetts held special events to honor those who had been affected by the devastation. Mass e-mails were sent out to everyone on campus, informing students and facility that the university and all its services would be there to help them through this emotional time. Letters were sent to student's homes, and donations continue to be given to assist those helping in the rescue efforts and those who have suffered loss in the attack.

Students have shared their reactions to what had happened, describing how these events have forever left a distinct footprint on their lives, while university professors have deliberated on what courses of action the government has available to them in terms of punishing those responsible for the attacks.

United States fights terrorism

It's safe to say that the entire world is still reacting to the terrorist attacks against the United States on September 11th with plans for retaliation against terrorists everywhere and with hopes to rebuild the faith of the Americans people.

With the question: "where do go from here?" still holding the minds of Americans in its iron grip, the country has begun the struggle to regain feelings of safety that were lost after the tragedy. President George W. Bush has sought to build a worldwide country united campaign against terrorists everywhere.

"Freedom-loving people understand that terrorism knows no borders, that terrorists will strike in order to bring fear, to try to change the behavior of countries that love liberty," Bush said. "And we will not let them do that."

The campaign has gained much support including an endorsement from Yassar Arafat, the President of the Palestinian Council, and from Megawati Soekarnoputri, the President of Indonesia.

"Indonesia has always been against violence. Anything that relates to violence, including acts of terrorism," Soekarnoputri said. "We will definitely be against it."

Megawati met with President Bush to offer her support and the support of Indonesia a country with the largest Muslim population in the world.

Also offering support to the United States in the war against terrorism are countries such as France and Great Britain.

"I've come here to tell you of the emotion – the emotion of France, the French people, an emotion which has no precedent in history before this tragedy, which does not have a parallel. Indeed, it is a tragic event, something which is beyond crime there are no words to qualify it," President Jacques Chirac of France said. "I want to tell President Bush, who is my friend, that we stand in total solidarity – we bring you the total solidarity of France and the French people. It is solidarity of the heart."

In addition to gathering a group of countries willing to stand up against terrorists President Bush has also ordered the deployment of over 100 US planes that are headed to the Persian Gulf region possibly as early as today to carry out any attacks against Afghanistan if the President chooses that route. Bush has made it clear however the United States will not attack without the appropriate amount of evidence.

With the death toll reaching to near 5,500 however complete return to normalcy still seems bleak as rescuers continue to search for bodies within the rubble. Only 218 bodies from what remains of the World Trade Center have yet to be found while 125 bodies from the Pentagon have been discovered.

While recovery continues so does debate about restoration of the world trade center. Many have pledged support to rebuild the towers as a way to show that Americans are getting on with their lives. While most agree that rebuilding the towers is a good idea, there has been some talk of modifying the design and making it more modern as well as possibly including some sort of memorial within the new plans.

SGA council meeting raises election doubts

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The UMass Student Government Association's Coordinating Council meeting last night raised the specter of last year's thrown-out Senate when the fact that not enough Elections Commissioners have been hired to oversee tomorrow's elections.

Title 8, Chapter 4 of the SGA Constitution states that there must be one Elections Commissioner present at every voting site at all times. There are five voting site across campus; right now there are two hired commissioners. Last year the SGA Elections Commission failed to hire the required five, thus resulting in an invalid election and the political downfall of the SGA. However, if no member of the SGA raises an objection to the lapse, the elections would be permitted to stand.

Members of the Executive Cabinet are planning on going forward with the election despite the discrepancy, saying that it is in the best interests of the SGA and the student body to have the elections on time and hoping that no element with the body will raise the objection necessary to void the elections.

"Last year so much damage was caused... and in turn brought down our entire organization," SGA President John Sheehan said. "This does pose a problem due to the fact that we have a lack of commissioners due to Area Governments in flux; however, it's all about doing what's best for the student body."

Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders shared similar thoughts on the issue, explaining that the SGA and its members need to look at the situation beyond the rulebook.

"We have to look at the reality of the situation and the fact that we are coming off of the worst year in SGA history," Saunders said. "We have not even had to chance to build up to the point where we could come in with the proper number of Elections Commissioners, but we have to ask ourselves if this is a valid reason to criticize the SGA. I don't want to see the greater interest of the student body jeopardized due to people worried about policies over what is best for students."

Sheehan and Saunders both stated that two capable assistants to Chancellor of Elections Sam Balasiak would be present at each voting site.

"We can guarantee that two capable individuals will be at every table," Sheehan said. "If people are going to hold that against us, then there is no way that they can say that they are working for the betterment of this student body."

However, the question of what could happen due to the decision to carry out the planned election date of Sept. 21st without the legal number of commissioners is still on the table.

"I wouldn't put it past some people to bring this to the judiciary," Saunders said. "But anybody who does this has absolutely no regard for student life and is acting out due to personal issues with individuals within this body."

Saunders continued by explaining that throwing out these elections would not benefit anyone and that is the reason the SGA is here is to serve the student.

"It's all about recruitment, student vote and getting started, and right now we don't even have the ability to run by all our policies, and that's what were trying to do, get back to ground zero," Saunders said. "If we can't do that by this year's Presidential and Trustee elections, then we haven't done what were capable of this year."

Aside from elections, members of the Coordinating Council also discussed the appointed switch of Gabriel Tavares to Chair of Finance and Mike Marin to Attorney General. After some questioning from council member Mike Taugher, who opposed the move, both changes were passed.

Both Marin and Tavares stressed that they will both be in their new positions until March 31, 2002.

Other issues tackled were regarding a requested $900 to be allocated to ALANA (African, Latino, Asian, Native American) Affairs. Debate arose between ALANA Director Nelson Acosta and Taugher regarding the allocation of funding to the group, with Acosta accusing the SGA of being uninvolved.

"If the SGA doesn't want to help us out that's fine. We'll just do what we always do and go and beg for money from other organizations," Acosta said.

The issue of funding was tabled until the next Coordinating Council meeting.

Kicking for NY victims

The UMass WTF TaeKwonDo Club will be holding a Klek-A-Thon in the Field classroom on Friday, September 28th at four o'clock p.m. to raise money for the victims of last week's terrorist attacks.

Each member of the club is looking for sponsors to pledge a certain amount of money per each 100 kicks performed. The athletes plan to each execute 2,500 kicks within the hour-long fundraiser.

"Our goal is to raise over a thousand dollars," said Matthew Rosomer, a member of the club. "Everything that we raise will be divided evenly between the Red Cross Disaster Relief Fund and the Uniformed Firefighter Association of New York."

The members of the TaeKwonDo Club will be manning a table in the Campus Center today and tomorrow from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. They will be seeking both pledges and direct donations.

"We're going to be basically soliciting sponsorships for the Kick-A-Thon. We're asking that everyone pay their contributions in advance so we can expedite the funds to those who need them," Rosomer said.

People interested in further information or making a donation should contact Rosomer at 545-3393.

Speakers discuss IMF role in third-world poverty crisis

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

At the Speakers of the Voices of the Global South teach-in held in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium last night, speakers proclaimed that the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank should be eradicated and are simply out for blood.

"We have strong reason to believe that [the IMF and World Bank] are not helping the poor, only sucking their blood and getting paid money," asserted Dr. Vineeta Gupta of Punjab, India.

Gupta said that the institutions "cannot change at all. They are worse than commercial banks. It has to go, it can't be reformed." She supports more democratic institutions and supports global organization and protests while co-speaker Molly Dhlanini supports fighting towards a more equal system and the importance of "ordinary people to lead."

Dhlanini is an active member of the youth and student movements in South Africa. Gupta's career spans fifteen years, from village doctor to human rights activist. She is currently challenging the World Bank-funded Punjab Health Systems Corporation hospitals for raising the medical care user fees of the poor. She is founder and general secretary of the human rights organization, Insaaf International. Dhlanini spoke in place of the original scheduled speaker, Demba Dembele of Senegal.

Gupta and Dhlanini both stated that the IMF and World Bank are receiving more than they are giving, and noted that their respective countries have a debt to these institutions sizably larger than the amount borrowed. In regard to the $28 million debt of South Africa and neighboring countries, Dhlanini said, "That debt is paid."

The institutions, Gupta explained, do more than require countries to reduce subsidies and privatize public sectors. She charges that the presence of these institutions undermine democracy because the government often listens to these institutions in key decisions, they heighten corruption, lead to socio-economic injustice and increase terrorism "which is very relevant today." Gupta believes that economic injustice is linked to terrorism.

Corruption can be found in the "free flowing funds that are totally unaccountable," Gupta stated. The funds are given for particular projects which Gupta said are neither appropriately patrolled nor need-based to see whether or not the money is reaching the people it sets out to benefit.

Dhlanini spoke mostly of the politics of South Africa and how the IMF, colonization and apartheid have all affected the current status of many African nations. She warned that the new liberal ideology that favors free market systems, free trade, privatization and capitalist exploitation is dominant everywhere and "makes it difficult for countries to redress the imbalance of the past."

"This globalization is not innocent. It has an ideology," Dhlanini asserted. She said the ideology forces itself upon people and countries, be it military or otherwise. She considers this a new form of oppression that "I believe people should realize and start to think of." She further related that capitalism is "concerned more about making a profit and the cause of taking blood."

Dhlanini criticized the institutions for giving money to nations such as the Democratic Republic of Congo. She said that the DRC ruler, who is "richer than his whole country," received money for the poor despite the fact that he was "oppressing his people and they knew he was oppressing his people."

The privatization of universities in South Africa was also criticized by Dhlanini. Currently, she said, universities are cutting social science departments and creating ones that will generate business for the university such as commerce.

The Radical Student Union followed the event with a showing of "Breaking the Bank" a documentary about the April 2000 protests of the World Bank and IMF in Washington, DC.

sent reeling out of its sense of security, students at the University of Massachusetts were no exception.

Both grief and shock were the first emotions that students felt when they had heard about the attacks, but the UMass community used the energy to successfully come together and help each other to grieve. Nearly 4,000 students turned out for a vigil on the Student Union lawn and many gave both blood and donations in order to help those in need.

Despite the fact that the immediate reactions are behind many Americans and UMass students the impact of the tragedy is changing the way that many go about their daily lives. Fear of flying is heightened now for many students that are choosing other means of transportation rather than getting onto airplanes.

The UMass women's field hockey team made a collective team decision to take a chartered bus to their game in Michigan this coming Friday rather than to fly due to the fact that some players were apprehensive about air travel. The trip, which could have taken the team approximately four hours, will now take them nearly two days to complete.

Other students expressed more of a sense of optimism about flying.

"The next time I get on a plane I suspect that I will be a little frightened," Bridget Flanagan a junior political science major explained. "But I don't plan on traveling for a while."

In terms of the President's decisions and the best way to handle terrorist attacks students also presented their opinions.

"My first reaction as a human being was to go in and kill the people who did this," Flanagan said. "Then after I sat back and thought about it for a while I realized that we should take our time and think it out before we take any action."

She went on to explain that she felt that this was indeed what both the government and the President intended upon doing.

Phillip Salbo, a freshman social thought and political economics major expressed a different opinion explaining that he felt that the atmosphere in the country was leaning towards physical conflict. He went on to explain that he felt that it was not only the President but that the entire government seemed to feel that way.

"I think it is going to be an all out war," he said.

He continued by explaining that he felt that war was not the appropriate way to go about handling things.

"I don't think he should retaliate," Salbo said. "We should get rid of the notion that we won't negotiate with terrorists, until we do that we have no chance of a peaceful solution."

Campus comes together

On Sept. 11th, after hearing one of the most devastating pieces of news in US history, the campus came together to help each other through the difficult feelings attached to the terrorist attacks during a candlelit vigil held on the lawn in front of the Student Union Building.

Since that night, various activities on campus have kept students, faculty and community members in close touch and have allowed them to help out in some small way.

During President Bush's appointed National Day of Remembrance, Sept. 14, the UMass Community Remembrance service was held at 3:00 pm by the Campus Pond. Campus officials and administrative staff, religious figures, students and musical groups each provided their condolences to those who have suffered and lost during the attacks.

The following Monday, Sept. 17th, the American Red Cross held a blood drive in Campus Center Auditorium from 10:30am to 4:30pm, drawing approximately 100 people to donate.

Reports are in that another blood drive is currently being planned. Updates as to where and when, as well as other pertinent information concerning UMass and its responses to the terrorist attacks, are available at www.umass.edu/chancellor/september11.

Collection sites for special funds for helping those devastated in the destruction have been set up at the COMECC Office in 236 Whitmore, the Chancellor's Office in 374 Whitmore, University Advancement in 390 Whitmore, Alumni Relations on the first floor of Memorial Hall, and the Treasurer's Office in 100 Venture Way.

The Student Center for Educational Research & Advocacy and the Student Government Association will also be putting together ribbons to distribute to students in the Campus Center in the near future. Help for the project is welcomed in room 420 of the Student Union Building, the Craft Center, or the RSO Resource Center.

UMass professors give opinions

It has been over a week since the September 11th terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, and in the wake of this tragedy, UMass faculty speculated on what actions the US will take in the coming weeks to follow.

Assistant professor and honors coordinator of the political science department, Vincent G. Moscardelli, believes while members of Congress have a very strong desire to play a large role in answering questions concerning what form of retaliation will be an appropriate response to the attacks, it is still unclear as to what their role will ultimately involve.

"Unlike with Pearl Harbor for instance," said Moscardelli, who specializes in American politics and political leadership of the US Congress, "it would be difficult for Congress to declare war [in this situation] primarily because it is difficult to say who we would be declaring war against."

One of the more popular controversies to debate on campus is whether or not the attacks were in fact a crime or an act of war, and political science professor M J Peterson, whose specialty areas include international law, has a strong opinion on the issue.

"This is terrorism, and terrorism is not a form of state war. It is a crime," she said, admitting that the attacks were an incredibly large-scale crime, having a higher death toll than daily death rates in some wars, but holding firm to the belief that it was a crime nonetheless.

The latest reports from New York and Washington stated that 5,422 people are still missing and presumed dead due to the attack on the World Trade Center while 218 bodies have actually been recovered from the rubble. Furthermore, 266 passengers and crew among the four hijacked planes are dead, and the death toll at the Pentagon is at 125. All together, close to 6,000 people were killed in that single day of terrorist attacks.

For reference, the death toll during the US's landing on Omaha Beach in Normandy in June of 1944 during World War II (often referred to as D-day) was about 2,400 Americans and 1,200 Germans dead, totaling 3,600 people.

According to Peterson, the situation will play out in one of two likely paradigms, depending on who committed the crimes.

" If another country did it, then it becomes a matter of state to state relations, an act of war," she explained. "You identify them, let everyone know, and go to war with that state. However, if the perpetrators are not a state, you enter the paradigm of criminal activity."

Since Osama bin Laden, a private citizen, has been under much suspicion for responsibility of the attacks, the US could invoke the use of Interpol, an international network of police, and pursue him as a criminal by sending an extradition request asking countries to hand bin Laden or any other suspect over to the US where they would stand trial, Peterson reported.

"It is even possible Afghanistan might not want to turn bin Laden over to America directly," she noted, "but might turn him into a different country, even if they know that country would turn him over to the US."

Moscardelli surmised that as of right now, Congress would support all of the president's decisions on these matter without any reservations, regardless of a member's political ideology, calling such a result the "rally around the flag effect."

However, he also forewarned, "If this [decision] process were to drag on for quite a while, the 'rally around the flag effect' would most likely begin to diminish," at which point he believes different political party views would cause some members to branch off with opposing ideas for remedying the situation.

He cited the 1990 situation when President Bush, the current President's father, declared his wish to invade Kuwait and was met with a strong opposition led by Georgia Senator Sam Nunn.

According to Moscardelli, Nunn, in reality a strong conservative who would therefore be thought of as more likely to agree with a conservative president, could not determine where a war with Saddan Hussein would end once it began, and such convictions took off into a great conflict of opinions.

Moscardelli questioned that if such a strong opposition was seen during that situation on what he called a 'relatively simple' issue, would an opposition just as strong spring up if invasion of another country was brought into serious discussion, especially since this situation is already much more complex with its uncertainty in exact details.

Aside from Peterson's beliefs that military retaliation is not warranted, she wondered how a US led attack would appear to the general public of Middle Eastern countries.

"If we bomb something in Afghanistan, doesn't that help Mr. bin Laden's argument that the US is against Islam as a whole?" she asked, adding that treating bin Laden or any person found guilty for the attacks as a criminal would prove that the US was against its offenders and not innocent people.

Peterson pointed out that without direct military action, "it will take a long time to bring these people to justice. It will take a lot of patience, [and it will] mean maintaining a mindset that questions why things like this happen."

Some information from this story came from CNN.com.

Despite the fact that the specific incident of terror is over, the United States may very well be feeling the ripples of the devastating attack for many years to come. The way that the world deals with terrorists and the way that America handles the safety of its people and its country are likely to face some changes as well. Diaz-Cotto discusses lesbian activism

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Despite a considerable amount of scholarship on gay and lesbian issues, very little academic attention has been focused on lesbians in Latin America. Juanita Diaz-Cotto, a professor of history, Women's Studies, and Latin-American Studies at the State University of New York – Binghamton, says that she is only aware of one book on the issue. It was for this reason that Diaz-Cotto delivered a lecture in the Campus Center yesterday, titled, "Lesbian Activism and Latin-American Feminisms."

"I wanted to put the information out there," she said. "If anyone wants to write a doctoral or master's thesis, this is new territory!"

The talk by Diaz-Cotto, which was part of the Stonewall Center's Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual/Transgendered [GLBT] Lecture Series, began with a brief history of Latin-American feminism.

"There have been two waves of feminism there," she said. "The first wave occurred at the turn of the century, for women to vote. They were concerned with suffrage."

"The second wave emerged during the mid-1970s," she added. "At this time, 18 of the 19 Latin-American countries had military dictatorships. Within these countries, though, anti-imperialist movements [began to spring up]."

Diaz-Cotto explained that feminists in these countries often became involved in these left-wing movements, only to become "disenchanted about men."

"When you are organizing against imperialism," she said, "guys will say, 'Let's overthrow this government, and afterwards, we'll give you equal rights.'" She added that gender equality never occurred, even if the overthrows were successful.

"It hasn't happened in Cuba," she said. "It's very hard to try to change sexism in only 40 years. The women think to themselves, 'Here I am, helping the guys, and they won't give me anything.' So they form their own movements."

Diaz-Cotto continued the lecture by describing Latin-American feminist conferences she had attended over the course of the past 20 years. She explained how the prominence of lesbian groups within the feminist movements had increased with time.

At one of the earliest Latin-American conferences, held in Colombia in 1980, no mention of gay issues was made. At one point, an attendee asked why little attention was being paid to the matter of lesbian rights. The organizers eventually agreed to take a stance against homophobia, but did so only by declaring "opposition to all oppressions", rather than mentioning lesbians specifically.

At modern conferences, however, not only are lesbian issues addressed, but lesbians often have their own caucuses.

Diaz-Cotto concluded by showing a slide show of the conferences she'd attended.

The lecture room was filled to capacity as, Mitch Boucher, a graduate student in English who teaches a section of the course "Man and Women in Literature" with a focus on GLBT issues, instructed his class to attend.

"[This lecture] is relevant to what we're going to be talking about with how one identifies as a lesbian, and how it differs through communities," Boucher said. "It differs depending on where you live, and it differs across time."

Agree to disagree:
We have a long road ahead

With the prospect of government action against the perpetrators of last week's attacks imminent, there are sure to be a lot of groups giving their opinion of what should happen.

On one hand, there are the people who believe that the government should show no mercy; that they should bomb Afghanistan and any other country that host terrorists in their country.

On the other end of the spectrum there are those that feel that there should be no military response; that we should find alternative ways of justice.

In the middle, we have people who may concede that a military response may be necessary, but think the government should use restraint in deciding how and where that military reaction should be used.

Regardless of where you stand, you should be careful to respect the opinion of others. The people who think we should find a peaceful response are no less patriotic than those who wish to bomb immediately, and therefore should not be labeled as such.

Furthermore, those who wish to bomb immediately cannot be automatically labeled as brutal and barbaric.

What we have to remember is that we are in unprecedented territory. Never before has the United States seen such an act of terrorism on its on soil. There is no precedent to draw upon, and no right or wrong answer.

The Bush administration has been hard at work the past couple of days evaluating their options. Soon they will make their choice.

If they chose to strike immediately there is sure to be protests from those who thought a peaceful response was best.

If they chose to try to find a different approach to the problem, there are sure to be groans from people who would have opted for a military response.

We should let those people protest and let those people groan. America is a society of democratic ideals, and a country where people can disagree and have intelligent conversations.

If you are a person who believes in military action, do not heckle and jeer when the inevitable protests that would occur after a strike may occur. Understand that they have a different opinion than you, and that they have a right to hold it.

If you believe in a peaceful response, do not get angry when those who wished for a military strike are upset if the administration decides to follow your ideal. They believe a military strike is the best alternative and they have a right to feel that way.

The United States has always been a country of freethinking. We must let all people feel and express whatever is on their mind.

We here at the Collegian understand that the next couple of days may be hard ones in the United States. Even if we disagree, we must stick together and support each other as a country.

M & M's, Spongebob and Life

ROB SCHULTZ

Know what picks me up when I'm sad? Peanut butter M&Ms.

And that isn't it, either. AC/DC records, Hello Kitty, vanilla frappes, naps (especially with someone else), bubble baths, writing, Jack Daniels and coke with two ice cubes, the first Batman movie, Hamlet, the Sox, puppies and Spongebob Squarepants all do the trick. I'm a big fan of Spongebob.

I've been spending a lot of time with these things thus far in the current semester. I don't want to belabor the obvious, but let's face it: it's been a semester of suck thus far and I don't really think that it's getting any better any time soon.

But that doesn't matter. It doesn't matter that New York exploded last week. It doesn't matter that we're probably going to war and are going to kill and be killed in numbers that none of us want to think about. Hell, it doesn't even matter that I got dumped and spilled beer on my only pair of good jeans in the same week. What matters, to me, at least, is that we're all still here. We made it.

Callous, isn't it? Cold? I don't think so. I'm not advocating that we attempt to forget what has happened. I wouldn't want to do that even if I had the ability. Our memory of this is something we will all need in the years to come. I'm not saying that we don't do anything about it. (I will say, and at great length, that I think that what we, as a country, are currently doing is stupid as all hell, but just ask me about that in person. I usually wear a Sox hat.)

What I am expressly saying is that it doesn't have to end our worlds. We need to move beyond the things that have happened. Not forget it, not let it have no effect on us as people, but to let it have no effect on the joy we get from our lives. I don't just mean what happened last Tuesday, either. I mean any personal loss that may have occurred that is still rotting inside. Too many people I know have been wrapped up in sorrow and tragedy their whole damned lives, a syndrome that it seems to me has reached epic proportions.

"We need to move beyond the things that have happened. Not forget it, not let it have no effect on us as people, but to let it have no effect on the joy we get from our lives."

I don't buy that. I've spent enough time in my life unhappy, alone and listening to metal records to have come to the conclusion that a life lived in that manner is really not worth living. When events come along that hurt, really really hurt, the temptation to wallow in that hurt, to dwell in it, to take it into me and just let it fester until it and I are the same is strong. I've been down that road, though, and it never ends anyplace good. To be accurate, it ends in the business end of a Black and Decker screwdriver. Not a good scene.

And that's why I took the time to notice the simple things that make me happy. I feel that I owe it to myself, and I don't limit it to me. I feel that everyone deserves some light in their world, and I think that everyone can find it if they just look. If they want to find it.

You may have noticed that all my little happinesspotions were things – that's because I'm an alone kind of guy, especially when the sh.t goes down. I'd rather chill in my room alone and work out my stuff, but it doesn't have to be that way.

What makes you happy? It could be any number of things. People can take great solace in their friends and family. In their work. In writing, art, building – some expression of creativity. Hugs. Hugs always work. I know a guy that, when he gets rip-roaring drunk, sings the old World War I song "Waltzing Matilda" again and again and again, and is happy as a clam, drooling and smiling away. He's pretty down and depressed every other hour of that day, but when he's in Matilda-land, he is one content dude. I wish he could find a place more easily accessible to find some joy; drunken singing isn't always feasible, especially in a lecture class. Peanut butter M&Ms are universal.

These are trying times for us all, but don't let them get to you. The only people who would want that are the people who think killing thousands of civilians is a great achievement. Look inside you and around you for a little hope, a shy smile, a moment of peace. Right now, I think we could all use a little SpongeBob.

Amherst, America, a race and me

BRIAN LOHNES

There is nothing quite as eerie as a silent racetrack. An environment usually filled with screaming people. Screaming engines and a heightened degree of excitement. But last Friday for two minutes the racetrack fell silent, and it was deafening.

It is interesting to consider how much of a cocoon we live in here at school. We have to confront the attack in nearly every class, through our friends, who know friends, who know people that were in the building and we read about it in the paper and see it on television everyday. But on the outside world it is different.

I left very guilty and pretty much wrong going to a racetrack last Friday. I guess it was a natural enough reaction because we all felt guilty about doing anything, reading novels, writing a paper, laughing. Then I found out that the rest of the world had decided to further their brow, hunker down and move on with life.

I had expected that there would be very few participants show up to go racing last Friday. I knew if I didn't work there that I would not be going there was just too much to think about too much to try to get around to justify being a good time. Much to my surprise there were about 200 cars that showed up. Some sporting flags, one sporting a particularly cool looking missile shaped sticker with the word "Retaliate, Now" printed on it. These people had made the conscious decision to do something that would take their mind off of what happened. They weren't going to let someone else disrupt their way of life and that hit me upside the head like a sledgehammer.

The more time we spend living in a state of guilt, living in a state of fear the more power we give those that attacked us. These people at the track are not racecar drivers per se. They are the corner mechanic, they are the carpenter that built the deck behind your house, the plumber that lives next door. They are the working men and women of America and they continued to live life the American way, with a strong sense of freedom. This should not suggest to you that the people didn't care. They were thinking about the attack but they weren't letting it rule their lives. I was.

I left the track at about 10:30pm on Friday night to drive back to UMass, it's about a 2 hour ride so I had some time on my hands. I was listening to talk radio and hearing all of the people calling in talking about vigils going on and the level of patriotism that has swept the nation. I decided to call into the radio station and throw my two cents in on the matter. One person had called and said that he feared for the nation if we got into a war because our generation would not have anywhere near the fortitude to support our effort. I think differently.

Personally, and this is easy to say right now, if a draft was reinstated and my number was pulled, I don't see how I could refuse. I don't see how I could turn my back on America and I really don't see how anyone else could either. I am not attempting to sound like a big macho guy here, I just think that others out there must feel the same way I do. It was interesting to me to hear the man say he didn't "think" we had it in us because we were never tested before. Well we would have to have it in us in a wartime situation there really aren't too many options involved. You either have the guts and buzzpah or you hop on a train or a bus to Canada, it's really that simple.

I have had a couple of good cries since all of the events began to unfold. When the firefighters, the empty feeling in my gut, and those who still have no idea where members of their family are. But none matched that one I had last Friday night looking at the American flag at half-mast, gently blowing in the wind, in front of a setting sun, with the national anthem playing. Boy, I set my jaw, gritted my teeth and just began to sob. That was my great moment of realization, we have to move on. Everyone in America has been touched by this, but we all haven't been shoved to the ground.

UMass, keep up the good work. We have donated our blood, given some of our money, our food, our prayers, and our clothing. UMass, the outside world has dusted itself off and, with a slight limp has begun to troop on. It is not time to forget what happened, but time to honor this country by standing strong.

The Hell of Good Intentions:
Why America Must Go to War

GEORGE THOMAS

Brutus, Brutus, puffed up in his virtue, refuses to dirty his hands for the cause of republicanism. True, he murders Caesar, but afterwards, he will not stoop to any devious means to further his ends—just as they are—against Marc Antony and Octavious Caesar. So high minded is he, that he'd rather the republic fall than taint his virtue. The need to prevail politically while remaining noble and virtuous is a perennial tension of politics. In Brutus we see this tension writ large: to preserve the republic, Brutus must brook some concession to necessity, which he is unwilling to do in that he thinks any such concession, even the very thought of it, soils his honor and virtue. Yet, the question becomes, is such a virtue even virtuous? Are we really to admire In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, rightly called the tragedy of Marcus those who refuse to dirty their hands in the name of a just cause? The comparison is perhaps overwrought, but I suggest that America, in wrestling with whether to use force against terrorism, faces a similar dilemma.

Less than a week after the attack on America, many Americans are holding peace rallies, which are preoccupied by the fear that America might meet violence with violence. These rallies condemn the terrorist attack against America, but call on the United States to respond peacefully. There is, at first glance, something noble about this: surely we should look for peaceful ways to settle our problems. A resort to force should be a last resort. Yet while their intentions might be good, the road to hell his paved with good intentions.

First of all, there is a worry that America will react in anger, that we are demanding blood for blood, and that this is wrong. Insofar as such thinking suggests that our response ought to be coolly calculated, this heed for restraint is good. At the same time, our anger—and its call for retribution—is healthy. Aristotle insisted that justice has it roots in anger: our anger, manifesting itself as moral outrage and demanding that someone be held accountable for massacring innocent people, and held accountable in an equitable manner, should spur us on to see that we do justice. And this is precisely where those calling for peace—as if we didn't want peace—are woefully naïve and profoundly misguided. They fail to recognize that justice, on occasion, might require the use of arms. And this is especially so when we cannot come to terms with those attempting to inflict harm on us. The people who think that we can reach some kind of compromise with terrorists waging a holy war against us, or sit down and talk about our problems, fail to grasp the nature of the conflict. Diplomacy, economic sanctions, and the like won't settle the problem with terrorists in general and Osama bin Laden in particular. We've already attempted all of this. In fact, there's a powerful argument to be made that the recent attack on America is a product of our bending over backwards to foster a peace process in the Middle East that indulges Palestinian violence against Israel precisely because we value "peace" above all else. Those who call for peace in this way believe that if we just sit down and talk we can settle our differences. But this isn't so. Radical Islamists are intent on waging war on us; it is not as if we can alter their will by way of negotiation (unless we pull out of the Middle East and let them have their way, and even then it's not clear that that will end their violence against us). Those calling for peace must realize that these groups do not want peace with us. We cannot appease such groups and we shouldn't attempt to do so. How do we respond to this other than by fighting to preserve our peace?

"Those who refuse to use violence run the risk of capitulating to those who willingly use violence... There's nothing noble or virtuous in letting injustice reign just to preserve our own moral purity."

The use of violence, dirtying our hands in a war we'd rather not have, is a necessity in defending ourselves against such an enemy. Those who refuse to use violence run the risk of capitulating to those who willingly use violence. Incorrigibly, they think goodness itself is enough. Not only is such thinking politically naïve, it smacks of the Ivory Tower; as if the refusal to do what is necessary is somehow a morally superior position. Take Brutus. He would rather the republic fail than dirty his hands (killing Antony, or at least denying him the right to speak at Caesar's funeral) ensuring that it succeeds. There's nothing noble or virtuous in letting injustice reign just to preserve our own moral purity. This isn't a morally superior position, it's morally obtuse and should be called so. It prefers the Ivory Tower to the real world, neglecting the fact that the peace, stability, prosperity and freedom we enjoy are secured, at times, by those who weren't so high minded. As Machiavelli says, "[We] should never allow an evil to run loose out of respect for a good." In fact, those who attacked America are counting on the fact that we won't have the stomach to defend ourselves. To remain virtuous while terrorists kill the innocent is to lose sight of the end of being virtuous in the first place. And so virtue is not all purity, but cleverness and cunning as well.

Whether we should use force against the agents of terrorism is a practical dilemma, not a moral dilemma. The question is how to use arms and against whom. Our biggest problem is one of strategy: how do we wage war on a will-o-the-wisp? That will take virtues that are not always appreciated in liberal democracy but are necessary to sustain it never the less.

how have the finer arts...

By Julie Burrell
Collegian Staff

Last week's tragedy affected everyone and every aspect of the country. Among those killed in last Tuesday's attacks were artists. And along with the towers, the art housed within their walls and around the area, was destroyed. Works by such important artists as Alexander Calder, Roy Lichtenstein and Joan Miro were among the works destroyed.

New York City has traditionally been at the center of fine arts. Art trends seem to have always rippled from this city. If you're tuned into the art world, in any of its manifestations, then you're tuned into New York City.

Art across the country and art within the city therefore has been touched by these events. The visual art world has taken its toll. The theatre community too has been hurt. Broadway was dark for two days, and reopened with sharply reduced attendance on Thursday night. Since that time, attendance has continued to stay low, as much of its business depends on tourists. Shows like the revival of Kiss Me, Kate, and the well-received Stones in His Pockets and The Rocky Horror Show are due to close this weekend, earlier than they were slated to end. A revival of Stephen Sondheim's Assassins was cancelled due to its subject matter, which includes attacks on presidents.

But people have slowly been returning to museums and performances. Broadway attendance is tentatively growing. Museums have been peopled with those looking for consolation in art. The Metropolitan Opera will stage a special performance of Verdi pieces on Saturday, with star Placido Domingo to benefit victims and the relief effort. NYC Mayor Giuliani has recently urged people who want to help to go see a Broadway the visual arts...

By Scott Eldridge with Rob Schultz

The visual art to come out of the tragedy has been acclaimed all around the media and the nation at large. As a photojournalist, I have formed my own opinions about the art that we have all been seeing. I believe that it can be broken down into four major categories: shock, hope, tragedy and rebirth.

I feel that the photos revolving around shock and hope are the most important simply because they are the ones that center around people. They are the keys to revealing the emotional aspect to this very physical tragedy in a crowded media blitz that still hasn't ended. The art of shock especially resonated in the photographs of people watching the news or near the tragedy: the people on the street as the buildings collapsed, Giuliani making his first speech. On a purely local level, the pictures that I took of the students clustered around the television sets in the Campus Center and Student Union had a very powerful quality. As every new revelation and development came over the news the students fell further and further into a state of disheartenment and amazement, and it was written plainly all over their faces. It was hard to behold, but it helped to pass the mood of the student body along accurately in the next day's paper.

The pictures of hope are even more famous and indelible, as they probably should be. Think of such iconic images as the firefighters raising an American flag among the rubble in a mirror image of the famous Iwo Jima picture. That is probably the most famous photo to come out of this tragedy, and for good reason. The value of this photograph lies in the way it represents hope, as well as the way it can be equated to images of the past. Hope was also evident in the photography here on campus of the vigil that was held the night of the attacks. All those thousands of people coming together in a show of solidarity made a memorable image of a united campus. It was an image that we needed to see.

The photos that I put into the 'tragedy' category are the ones that mostly revolve around the physical. Think of the images: a man on top of some of the rubble with what remains of the towers rising in front of him; the video footage panning over the expanse of the devastation; the street signs and lampposts in New York City covered in pictures of missing family members and loved ones. plastered to their televisions, computers, radio, and newspapers seeking up-to-the-minute coverage of the devastating attacks. It wasn't until the weekend approached that many people decided to step back and realize that they turn to entertainment for enjoyment—something that holds the attention by something amusing or diverting.

Right now, they turn to musicians and the music industry for direct aid, as the industry mobilizes to help victims of Tuesday's terrorist attacks and their families.

Most notably, a group of pop stars led by Michael Jackson plan to record a new song to raise a staggering $50 million for survivors and families of victims of last week's terrorist attacks. Jackson will produce the song called "What More Can I Give," which will be recorded in English and Spanish versions. The all-star recording so far includes Jackson, Destiny's Child, Britney Spears, Justin Timberlake of 'N Sync, Nick Carter of the Backstreet Boys, and Mya, with other names sure to follow.

"I believe in my heart that the music community will come together as one and rally to the aid of thousands of innocent victims," Jackson said. "There is a tremendous need for relief dollars right now and through this effort each one of us can play an immediate role in helping comfort so many people."

The song will be released as soon as possible and proceeds from the song's distribution will go to a relief fund for the victims' families and survivors.

Jackson is no stranger to helping out important causes and unfortunate victims. In 1985 Jackson co-wrote and performed "We are the World" in which scores of pop stars participated. The song has raised $65 million for famine relief organization USA for Africa.

"We have demonstrated time and again that music can touch our souls. It is time we used that power to help us begin the process of healing immediately," Jackson said.

Alanis Morissette also wants to stage one or more benefit concerts for those affected by the tragedy. In a message to fans on her website (www.alanismorissette.com), she wrote that she's talking to others "about putting on some sort of relief show(s) with the purpose of reaching out to those who have been touched by all that has happened this week...I'll keep you posted."

Madonna has also contributed to the tragedy by donating proceeds from all three of her last gigs in Los Angeles. Her decision to donate the funds follows a prayer for peace she led on Friday, urging Bush to show restraint: "I'd like everyone to say a prayer that President Bush practices restraint in his decision making, and he does not retaliate this act of violence with another act of violence. Because violence only begets violence."

"I don't know about you, but I want to live a long and happy life, and I want my kids to live a long and happy life," she continued. "We're not doing this show because we want people to forget," she told the audience, which included such celebrities as actress Cameron Diaz and comedian Andy Dick. "We're doing this because we want people to remember how precious life is." "It was horrible [on Tuesday], but I'd like to think of it as a wake-up call. There's terrorism every day all over the world," Madonna s a d

Backstreet Boys donated at least $10,000 in proceeds from their show Wednesday in Toronto to the American Red Cross and New York and Washington, D.C., police and fire department funds.

Record companies are also helping out, according to MTV. Vivendi Universal, parent of the Universal Music Group (Interscope, Geffen, A&M, Island Def Jam), will donate $5 million to relief efforts, as well as raising money for the United Way's September 11th Fund by matching employee donations (on a two-to-one basis).

MTV also reports that Bertelsmann, which houses BMG Entertainment (RCA, Arista, La Face, Bad Boy, J Records), has donated $2 million to a fund that will assist families of firefighters and police officers lost in the World Trade Center disaster, and the EMI Group pledged $1 million to relief efforts.

Over the weekend, sympathetic songs by Live, U2, Enya, and others have been transformed into radio memorials helping listeners cope with the devastating tragedy.

Pop stars have shined brightly in the past week by not only providing the fodder for consolation but also becoming an integral part in direct aid. Their outpouring of support is highly commendable. They have showed that entertainment is tremendously important not only in our every day lives but also in times of uncharacteristic need.

almost accidental footage of the buildings falling and the second plane hitting. These are things I don't see being quickly forgotten.

Unfortunately, much of this footage, initially brilliant and needed, has been overdone to the point where its impact is all but lost. You can only see these things so many times before it becomes counterproductive, preventing us from moving on to the next and final stage of the art of this tragedy, rebirth.

Rebirth coverage is just beginning. Perhaps the first real footage was of the few survivors emerging from the rubble, something we all needed to see. There have also been the pictures of the widely successful Red Cross blood drives nationwide and on-campus, White House employees shaking the hand of the President as they return to work, stockbrokers waving flags as Wall Street reopened and life began to go on. There will be more of this as time progresses, but what we have now is already reassuring.

show in support of the community.

Art, it seems, has always been used as a catharsis, both for the artists and their audience. Throughout time art has responded to tragedy, and people have responded to tragedy through art. For the audience, seeing and experiencing how others have dealt with loss is a way to relieve some of the pain.

Some of the most talked-about, important and beautiful art has been made as a reaction to loss. The Vietnam Memorial, designed by architect and sculptor Maya Lin, was controversial when it was first erected, but has become one of the most recognized symbols of wide-scale loss and one of the best-loved memorials.

There is no doubt that art will arise from the ashes of these events. People will continue to go to museums and performances, not mainly as a form of diversion, but as a way to deal with and confront their grief.

Artists will produce works that speak of the tragedy. The art community was hurt. But, art will continue to thrive in New York and beyond.

Tragedy alters audience Response to entertainment

As Americans watched the events of the past week unfold on their television sets, the general consensus has been that the broadcast networks have done an adequate job with coverage. The networks themselves lost nearly $100 million each in advertising revenue by airing commercial-free coverage.

The networks will even make history this Friday, when NBC, ABC, CBS, and Fox all simulcast the commercial free special "America: A tribute To Heroes." A fundraiser, the special will feature dozens of celebrity performances running the gamut from the likes of Alicia Keyes to Conan O'Brien.

Plans have also been shelved for various television movies and series in the works that involved terrorists and/or bombings. Fox has delayed the late October premiere of its new program "24," and NYPD Blue has even altered its opening due to terrorist connotations.

But for all the good the broadcast networks have done, they are not totally absolved from being scrutinized for some of their actions. For one, the constant replaying of the second plane that crashed into The World Trade Center was excessive and macabre. Not that the crash should never have been shown. But use of the crash in news opens and montages was unnecessary, simply because it desensitizes the viewing audience to a horrific event, and desensitization is hardly what America needs more of. Seeing the crash set to music, kicking off a news broadcast with some flashy headline like "America At War," makes the event seem like a TV movie rather than the real life tragedy that it is.

The boundaries of what is acceptable were also tested when the broadcast networks chouse to air footage of people jumping from the high floors of the World Trade Center to escape the fire and smoke. On one level, it is news, and should be reported on, and on another level it is completely gruesome and horrific. After all, these are the same channels that won't allow swear words to be uttered.

Due to public complaints, the networks were forced to evaluate their stances on what they deem appropriate for airing on their news broadcast. Thus far, ABC News has been the only network to commit to no longer airing footage of the plane crash. The others haven't been as quick, as NBC has publicly stated that they will continue to use the footage if it "germane" to the story, while CNN's stance is that they will use the footage "judiciously."

While the networks should be commended for pulling back plans for programming that could be seen as exploitive for the time being, don't count on them to ride that wave forever. Quite simply, if network executives feel that there is green to be made, they are going to give most anything the green light. What that means is don't be surprised to see a TV movie within the next year "chronicling" the attacks. While such a production would probably be under the guise of helping Americans "heal," or "remember the victims," likely it would suspiciously occur right around sweeps time. Also, if a full-scale war begins, be on the lookout for an influx of war movies on television, all with pro-war stances

The end result of the conflict (if there is one in the near future) will determine when and if television programming ever gets back to normal. Many will undoubtedly never look at a plane crash or bombing on television or film the same way again. Will it be possible to entertain with those images ever again? Like they did this past week with news coverage, the power brokers in the industry will have some serious decisions to make over the next few months and years over exactly what is appropriate viewing. A year from now, network executives may deem it appropriate to again bomb buildings and hijack planes on television (and in the movies for that matter!). But will it really be anymore appropriate then than it is now?

NFL makes the right call: 16 weeks

4th and inches with David Rose

On Tuesday, the NFL came down with a decision that has put even more importance in its regular season games.

The league's edict 48 hours ago was to play the entire 16-week schedule as planned. Now, the NFL looks as if they will get rid of the wild card round of playoff action, although no official word has been made yet on how the postseason situation will be handled.

I agreed with the NFL's decision not to play this past weekend and I agree with the decision to play all 16 games as well. There are those I have talked to that point out that the league only played 15 weeks in the 1987 season because of the NFL Players' strike that took three weeks to resolve.

WHAT? These people are going to try and attempt to put a players' strike and the biggest disaster in the country's history in the same sentence. That is the most shallow thing that I have ever heard and needs no further wasting of my time to go over.

The NFL needs a 16-game schedule to be as fair as possible for every team to have a chance at the postseason. If they would have gone 15 games, then situations for tie-breakers, divisional play and the fact that one team, San Diego, would have played 16 games since they would have had a bye last week would have made for headaches down the stretch of the season.

However, there are pros and cons for having just four teams from each conference making the playoffs. One pro for this is that the regular season games are that much more important. Now instead of a 10-6 record making it as a wild card team, if you go 11-5, there is a strong possibility that you will be home watching the games instead of playing in them.

On that note, one con of an eight team playoff lies in the AFC. Arguably, six of the top eight teams in the league reside in the AFC (Indianapolis, Miami, Tennessee, Baltimore, Oakland and Denver). Also, as it has been proven in the last couple of seasons, there is always one surprise team from the AFC that makes a run. The Titans went to the Super Bowl in 1999 and the Ravens won the whole thing last year. This was after both teams had missed the playoffs the year before. The surprise team everybody is pointing at is San Diego after a 30-3 win over Washington in week one. What's the point of all of this? If only four teams from the AFC get into the postseason, two of the leagues top six teams can win 11 games and not make the postseason, making Miami's opening week shocker in Tennessee that much more important.

Another pro of eight teams in the playoffs is that teams that have no business in the postseason now will not make it. In 1999, the Dallas Cowboys and the Detroit Lions both made the playoffs with records of 8-8. The Packers, also at 8-8, would have made the playoffs, if the Cowboys had lost there last game to the Giants, a team that was 7-9. Needless to say, both teams were mopped out the playoffs early, the Cowboys falling to Minnesota while Washington thumped the Lions. Teams like that would not be able to make the playoffs, and quite frankly, teams who hacked into the playoffs like the Cowboys and Lions did that season do not deserve the bid.

On the other side, the con of that is that in the playoffs, every team's record is 0-0 and anything can happen. In 1996, the Jacksonville Jaguars made the playoffs after Morten Andersen shanked a field goal on the season's last play for Atlanta. The Jags were a fifth seed. If this year's format of eight playoff teams was around in 1996, the Jags would have had nothing to play for. However, the Jags made it all the way to the AFC Title game that year before falling to the Patriots.

The Arizona Cardinals of 1998 is another example. They were the number six seed and were 1-18 in the last 19 games against their first round opponent, the Cowboys. However, the playoffs were a different story and the Cardinals won 21-10. In this case, a lower seed was given a chance to play and showing off its skills.

Another pro of an eight-team playoff without a wild card is that we will not be subjected to those snooze city games that usually happen in the first round. For example, the Philadelphia-Tampa Bay game last year was a disaster. The Eagles won the contest 21-3 with the only excitement being that the game finally ended.

However, once in a while, the first round gives us those classic games to remember. Case in point, the 1998 wild card game between San Francisco and Green Bay. The first round clash became not only the best game of that postseason, but also one of the greatest playoff tilts in NFL history. Terrell Owens' 25-yard touchdown snag with three seconds left beat the Packers 30-27. While that game was a classic, those games in the first round come few and far between.

Commissioner Paul Tagliabue had to make a conscious decision whether or not to play the games last weekend after the New York and Washington tragedies. I felt he made the right decision in that case and gave the players of the NFL a time to mourn and thank those who are working tirelessly in relief efforts for this country.

Now, on a smaller scale, commissioner Tagliabue has made another right decision by deciding to play the full 16-game schedule to keep the integrity of the season as is. Now he has another tough decision. Super Bowl XXXVI is scheduled for January 27 in New Orleans. The NFL asked if the National Auto Dealers Association could move its convention back from a week after the Super Bowl to the following week so that it could get its full slate of playoff games in. Although the NFL is a business and losing that week of playoff games would equal a loss in revenue for all the teams around the league, I think they need to go with the eight-team format as they had originally talked about.

It would not be right of the NFL to move the venue of the Super Bowl, as some people have talked about. New Orleans has done a lot of planning for what will be going on that Super Bowl week. It is not just a one-week plan and go deal. It takes months; even years to plan what goes on down in a city that host the Super Bowl. Moving the game to a warm weather sight, like Miami just so it can get in its full amount of playoff teams would be a decision that has no merit.

The fans of the NFL complain that, at some points, the games in the regular season mean nothing because they know what teams will make the playoffs and the two or three junk teams that make the playoffs every year have no business being there. The eight-team format would make every game for every team a must-win situation. Just ask a team like Denver. They threw away a game at Kansas City last year because they did not show up to play. They lost the division to Oakland by a game, but made the playoffs because of the wild card. Their record last year was 11-5. If that same thing happened this year as it did last year in an eight team free for all, the Broncos who were the fifth seed last year, would be watching the playoffs this season. That, along with what has already transpired over the last week, would make the games of the 2001 season more meaningful than any season in NFL history.

Stadium precautions increased nationwide

By Chuck Corder
The Reveille (Louisiana State U.)

(U-WIRE) BATON ROUGE, La. – When NCAA schools open its gates for football this weekend, stadiums everywhere will be surrounded by a greater sense of security with more police officers and inspections taking place as fans walk in.

Auburn (2-0) travels this weekend to the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, which is approximately four hours from the site of last Tuesday's devastation in New York City.

Management Director of the Carrier Dome Pat Campbell said fans should expect a wait as all cameras, seat cushions and binoculars will be inspected.

"Mainly we're beefing up staff with more unit personnel to conduct searches for prohibitive items," said Campbell, who had two friends escape from the second World Trade Center tower before it collapsed. "It's going to slow things down. The building is always manned 24 hours a day, but we use to let people buying tickets go in and see their seats. We're not going to do that now."

Closer to home, LSU Event Management Director Ted Stickles said next week LSUPD, along with city and state police will meet to discuss how pre-game checks for the Oct. 6 game against Florida will be handled.

The Tigers are off this week and will next play on Sept. 29 at Tennessee.

"We're encouraging people to come early by opening the gates three hours before the game," Stickles said. "If people show up at game time wanting to go in, it's not going to be a reasonable option."

Stickles said numerous fans called last week asking questions about what precautions were being taken to ensure safety before the Southeastern Conference postponed all games, including Auburn-LSU.

Both Campbell and Stickles said because of the national tragedy, taking extra measures now was not a decision they thought long about.

"It certainly makes everyone reevaluate the process," Campbell said. "I'm quite certain that most people I know work quite diligent with security. Frankly, not knowing what's going to happen in the next weeks or two years, it could stay like this."

At the University of Michigan, which boasts the country's largest collegiate stadium with 107,501 seats, security measures will be "enhanced," said Bill Bess Director of Public Safety.

Bess said while staffing for this weekend's game with Western Michigan is still ongoing, fans should not expect to see more uniformed officers in the tailgating area.

"The uniform presence has always been a relatively high visibility issue for us anyway," he added. "We try very hard to be visible throughout the stadium and you'll see that ... to a greater degree than you have in the past."

At the nation's second largest stadium on the campus of Penn State, officials have requested local airports and the Federal Aviation Administration to prohibit banner planes from flying over Beaver Stadium.

Penn State is also encouraging fans to show up early with parking lots opening at 7 a.m. for the 12:10 p.m. kickoff.

"The safety of our fans has always been and will continue to be our top priority at every Penn State home football game and athletic event," said Tim Curley, Director of Athletics.

SEC spokesman Aaron Jordan said the conference is leaving it up to the member institutions about what steps they will take to guarantee safety.

Jordan believes fans will cooperate with the slow lines at the gates this weekend, understanding the caution is for each individual's safety.

"If you watch the TV or read the newspapers people at the airport and major league [baseball] games are saying, 'It's taking longer and I'm glad,'" Stickles said.

Campbell said he hopes people will appreciate the tighter security, realizing what the alternative would be if stadiums continued on without modifications.

Syracuse's new policies for Saturday include locking the doors once everyone is inside the Carrier Dome and not permitting people a smoking pass, which let people back into the arena beforehand.

"I'd err on the side of being more stringent than not," Campbell said. "You just don't know. You can't take things for granted in light of what's happened."

Stickles said fans should expect extensive searches through all their belongings including purses, binoculars, backpacks and diaper bags.

"It's changed the way we operate," he said.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – A little well-timed humor can add just enough levity to an otherwise serious situation to allow you see things more clearly and realistically. Look through the kaleidoscope of your life and find some color.
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Take care that what begins as a game between you and a close friend or loved one doesn't become too aggressive, but if it does, just go on the Jerry Springer Show.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Things that first catch your eye today are likely to be at the dead center of your attention for a great deal longer than expected. Stop looking at the weird freckle on your professor's face.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – The information available to you today can certainly make the difference between success and failure – provided you use it properly. Read The Onion's Safe Sex Tips.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You don't have to go out of your way to attract attention today. Just continue to wear that same Boston Red Sox jersey and those blue shorts. It's a real fashion statement.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You may be surprised to learn just what you can and cannot do today – according to those who make the rules. So when your RA writes you up, tell her that rules are meant to be broken.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) –You've been endowed with a great deal of foresight, so why not put it to good use today? You haven't been reading the signs lately! When the sign says "Don't Walk," don't walk.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Information is only valuable if others are willing to listen and absorb it; for this reason packaging is of great importance today. For that reason, be sure to read the directions before unpackaging your banana.
TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Sometimes, whether you like it or not, you have to blow your own horn just to get others to notice that you've been doing a good job all along. Toot toot!
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – There may be something rather mysterious about you today, and, at the same time your self-confidence is sure to attract a number of admirers. Hopefully these admirers won't be the old women in the frozen food isle that tell you to get their frozen peas because the cold affects their arthritis.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – You feel as thought you're zeroing in on an important target today, but the fact is you may be further from the truth than before. You're a Cancer, that sucks.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You're in the mood to be on top of the world today, like Brandy, but you may not want to work for the privilege. A competitor has some rival notions. So kick his butt Stone Cold style.

Minutemen tame Wildcats

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

In the words of Saturday Night Live characters Wayne Campbell and Garth Algar: "Game On!"

The Massachusetts men's soccer team has been patiently waiting to hear those words for nearly a week and a half now.

Due to the tragic events of last Tuesday, the Maroon and White last played a match on September 9 – a 2-1 victory over Boston University at Totman Field. Out of respect, the UMass Classic – which was supposed to be played in Amherst over this past weekend – was cancelled on Thursday.

UNH	0

The squad returned to the pitch yesterday and finally heard the coined phrase as they faced-off with non-conference foe, New Hampshire in the Granite State.

With black armbands wrapped around the sleeves of their jerseys commemorating the victims in the World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks, the Minutemen pulled out an important 2-0 shutout victory over the Wildcats and improved their record to 3-2.

"Everybody was focused," Head Coach Sam Koch said. "The tragedy was of course on the back of our minds but we had to put it aside and think about our opponent for the time being."

Like any team that had been off for almost two weeks, UMass started the game lackadaisical and was missing their fiery offensive attack.

"In the first half we came out a little sluggish," Koch said.

At the end of the first half the score was knotted at zero. Massachusetts' defense was able to shut down the UNH offense, which kept the Minutemen in the game. Senior goalkeeper Brian O'Quinn once again led the defense. The co-captain had 12 saves on the day.

"There was a lot of pressure on him from all angles," Koch said. "However, he made key saves and kept them off the board."

During halftime, the Minutemen must have had shaken off the rust. When they returned to field for the next 45 minutes, they returned with vengeance.

In the 75th minute, senior Shawn Green fired a deflected shot by sophomore Dan Colwell, giving UMass their first goal of the match. The goal by Green turned out to be the game winner.

In last week's match against Boston University, UMass was forced to play through two extra periods in order to finally defeat the Terriers. This time around the guys made sure they would not have to exceed the 90-minute regulation time.

Just eight minutes after the first goal, junior Yuri Morales sent one past UNH goalkeeper Shaun O'Neil – giving UMass some breathing room and making the score 2-0.

"In the second half our play was a lot better," Koch remarked. "We knocked the ball around better, our passes were crisper and we found the open man every time."

Once again, the Minutemen were out shot by their opponent in the match. New Hampshire was able to get off 24 shots while UMass had 21 shots. Fortunately for coach Koch' squad, the Massachusetts defense was able to stifle the Wildcat's offense for the final remaining minutes of the contest en route to the 2-0 victory.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The Maroon and White's swarming defense, led by captain goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn (in black), blanked the New Hampshire Wildcats yesterday.

TIBORA GRCZYC-BLUM/COLLEGIAN

Kevin Quinlan (No. 8) and the rest of the UMass football team will take the field for the first time in two weeks on Saturday at Delaware, a team that has given the Minutemen fits in previous years.

Minutewomen back in city of brotherly love

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Two points in an entire volleyball season are generally only a speck on the map for a team. But when those two points make the difference between making the playoffs and ending the season, they take on a whole new meaning.

The Massachusetts volleyball team, who missed making the Atlantic 10 tournament last season by a mere two points, open up its all-important conference schedule as it heads to the streets of Philadelphia this weekend with key matches against LaSalle and Temple.

"The people we have [on our team] played a lot last year, so they understand that in the A-10 there aren't any really easy matches," head coach Bonnie Kenny said.

UMass (5-2) enters the weekend still on a high from its 3-0 performance in the UMass Invitational held Sept. 7-8 in Amherst. This past weekend's trip to Florida was cancelled due to the tragic events of last week.

"We're in the same boat as everybody else in the country because nobody played last weekend, so we're on level playing ground," Kenny said.

The last time the Minutewomen traveled to Philly, they finished off their regular season with consecutive wins over the Explorers and Owls, the match against the latter being a five-game triumph over the perennial powerhouse.

"Last year, we upset Temple to end the season, and I think they remember that so that should give them a boost of confidence," Kenny said.

The first match of this weekend will be a Friday night contest against the Explorers (3-6, 0-1 Atlantic 10). The Maroon and White swept LaSalle in both contests last year. Senior co-captain Lynnard Llovet posted 23 kills in the two matches to lead the Minutewomen to crucial A-10 victories.

"Every year, LaSalle gets a little better," Kenny said. "On paper, this is the best team they've had there. There are a couple of returning players that will help them."

LaSalle opened the conference portion of its schedule Tuesday night, when it fell to A-10 conference champion George Washington.

The Explorers are led on offense by senior outside hitter Kristen Russo, who leads the team with 2.60 kills per game. Russo led the team in kills in each of the last two matches against the Minutewomen. She is one of five LaSalle players averaging more than two kills per game this season. Russo also sets the pace on the defensive side of the ball, as her 3.73 digs per game are tops on the team.

The second match of the weekend will pit the Maroon and White against its conference rival, Temple. That contest will be held at 4:00 on Saturday afternoon.

"Temple will be a different team than last year, but again it's a really good skill team," Kenny said. "They're not playing a lot of people, but those that are playing are contributing in a good way."

Temple (6-2) is led on offense by a pair of outside hitters. Junior Sara Stone has proven strong throughout this year, averaging nearly ten kills per match for the season. Sophomore Yamit Haba, the 2000 A-10 Rookie of the Year, is adding support, as she too is averaging nearly ten kills in her matches this season.

As for the Minutewomen, their offense has been led by a quartet of fierce hitters up front. Co-captains Llovet and Janeen DeMarte have provided strong play on both sides of the ball from the outside, while senior Lauren Vander Veen and sophomore Nitia Small have been consistently throwing down kills all year.

"I think that we go as our offense goes," said Kenny, who led the Maroon and White into a tie for fourth place in the conference last year. "If we keep improving offensively, I think we could have a very successful run at the A-10 championship."

And it all starts this weekend.

Looking to return triumphantly

Minutemen prepare to battle for first win

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

The dangerous Delaware Blue Hens. Massachusetts football fans across the Pioneer Valley shutter at the name. Just three wins in 23 games. A 31-19 defeat at home a year ago. The scales are heavily tipped against the Minutemen. But remember one thing – UMass will not be intimidated.

"I watch all these other teams go in there hesitant," coach Mark Whipple said. "We will not be hesitant."

The Maroon and White (0-2, 0-0 Atlantic 10) are a young team and like any young team they will make mistakes.

"I'd like to say we won't make any mistakes," Whipple said. "But I'm still potty training some of these guys. I get older by the day."

But another characteristic of a fledgling squad is the ability to play with reckless abandon. Sometimes an inexperienced side can be even more dangerous than a roster full of wily veterans. Just ask Delaware.

In week 1, the Hens fell to a youthful Rhode Island squad that played like it had nothing to lose. The Minutemen could potentially pose the same sort of problems.

The principle concern for UD coach Tubby Raymond's defense may be redshirt freshman quarterback Matt Guice. If the Hens look at the game tapes from Guice's two starts they will see two very different looks.

In his first game against William & Mary, Guice looked very much like a rookie. He threw balls high and behind his receivers and he seemed very indecisive when deciding whether to scramble or throw.

With Division I-A Marshall looming in week 2, one would think that Guice's performance would continue to falter – on the contrary.

The freshman all but reversed his 79-yard passing atrocity against the Tribe by gunning 12 completions for 149 yards and two TD's (one rushing, one passing).

Guice will have to be just as effective, if not better, against a talented and tenacious Delaware defense. Dan Mulhern, who led the team with 142 tackles a year ago, is back to lead the "D."

Fortunately for the Minutemen, the match up against Marshall may pay dividends as soon as this Saturday. The Hens have a strong following and their stadium in Newark, DE is usually close to capacity on game day. But it is nothing compared to the 27,000 plus fans that the Thundering Herd brought in for their match up against the Maroon and White.

UMass should come into this contest teeming with confidence. The Minutemen proved to themselves and their fans that they could move the ball against anybody by piling up 355 yards against Marshall.

The defense also proved they could step up by making big time plays against Heisman trophy candidate Byron Leftwich and Biletnikoff finalist Darius Watts.

Although the Hens may not have any skilled players of the Herd's caliber, Tubby Raymond has plenty of game breaker's at his disposal.

"[WR Brett] Veach is really fast and [WR Jamin] Elliott is as good as anybody in the league," Whipple said.

The key to the game for the Maroon and White, what they did not do last year, is stopping the big play. If the Minutemen can keep the explosive UD offense under wraps and disturb first year starter QB Sam Postlethwait, then the defense will have done it's job.

"You just don't want to give up the big play," Whipple said.

But more than anything, the Minutemen have to bust into Newark and simply play their game.

"We're gonna go down there," Whipple said. "We're gonna hit 'em in the mouth, and we're gonna play UMass football."

SGA voting to kick off

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's Senate election booths are open this morning at 10 a.m. despite questions that have been raised recently regarding the electoral policies.

One of five hired Electoral Commissioners is required to be at every voting site under the SGA Constitution, Title 8, Chapter 4. This, however, will not be possible due to a lack of active Area Governments and the SGA's inability to acquire commissioners who would have needed to be approved fifteen days prior to the election day.

Members of the SGA's Coordinating Council and Executive Cabinet addressed this recently. Under a joint decision made by Senate Speaker Aaron Saunders, SGA President John Sheehan, and Chancellor of Elections Sam Blasiak, they decided to have the elections as scheduled.

This does, however, pose questions as to what could and may happen as a result of this decision. Last year, the SGA faced the wrath of a thrown-out Senate due to the same lack of commissioners at voting sites.

However, this year has been guaranteed to be different by Sheehan and Saunders, despite the lack of commissioners.

"To deny students who have been working hard an election based on one's title is wrong," Saunders said. "Everyone is running at 110 percent, and we need to look at the reality of the situation and not dwell on what we can't change."

Sheehan expressed similar thoughts by explaining that focusing on policies over student well-being will not get the SGA nor the student body anywhere.

"We can guarantee that two knowledgeable people will be at every table," Sheehan said. "We can't advocate to students if we spend our time fighting on policies such as these."

Blasiak also expressed his confidence in today's elections and commended members of the SGA Coordinating Council who questioned the situation.

"Obviously, the Coordinating Council is there to oversee my performance and they definitely did the right thing by expressing their concern," Blasiak said. "I'm positive that everything will go smoothly. Right now we have nine capable assistants and three or four more who are working on times with us."

Excited about only four seats lacking nominees and electoral races in three of the five at-large areas on campus, Saunders expressed his

Stonewall barbeque bridges social gaps

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

In his book Dangerous Liaisons: Blacks, Gays and the Struggle for Equality, author Eric Brandt notes the similarities between the struggles of people of color and the gay/lesbian/bisexual/transgendered [GLBT] community.

Many have pointed out the parallels between the lynching of James Byrd, Jr. in Texas and the murder of Matthew Shepard in Wyoming," he writes. "And the erosion of affirmative action in last November's election seems to have gone hand-in-hand with the defeat of equal rights initiatives for lesbians and gays in states across the country."

Yet despite a shared history of oppression, Brandt notes that racial and sexual minorities have not always banded together. He cites as examples black leaders who oppose gay rights, and gay organizations that discretely exclude blacks.

Workers at the University of Massachusetts Stonewall Center, an on-campus GLBT resource center have for years worked to bridge the gaps between these groups, and to establish a haven for GLBT people of color. It was in this spirit that the Stonewall Center held its ThirdAnnualAfrican American/Latino/Asian/Native American [ALANA] barbeque last night.

"There are different issues that people of color who are queer face than your average whites," said Stephen Pereira, Assistant Director of the Stonewall Center. "I'd have to say that I, as a queer person of color, have different issues than the average white gay man. There are different cultures, with different views on gender.

"We try to be very aware of the programming we do, and reflect every segment on campus", he said. "We want to have a safe place for queer people of color to meet."

"I think there's always work to be done on a personal and community level," he added. "I think that queer groups are responsive to racial issues, but only to a point – it definitely could be better."

Trevin Lau, a multicultural career counselor at Mount Holyoke College's Career Development Center, attended the barbeque. On her backpack was a button that read, "Racism– Sexism–Homophobia. Recognize the Connection."

I think that [issues of race and sexuality] are connected," Lau said. "I usually draw analogies between homophobia and racism, to let people see that connection."

"If you condemn racism for being unfair, you must also condemn homophobia for being equally unfair," she added. "They're both [about] oppressing people."

Pereira and Lau both commented that the typical image of an American gay person is of a white person, and that work is needed to correct this.

"When you think of gay people in the media, the great majority of them are white, especially on TV," said Lau. "I think in general, in America, when people think of other people, they think of white people."

Kevin Trimell Jones, a Master's student in Social Justice Education, agreed.

"I think when we think of a gay community, we think of a white gay community," Jones said. "There are a lot of oppressions – not just racial ones."

Jones does not identify as "gay", because he feels that the word has a connotation of whiteness. "I identify as 'same-gender-loving", because of the whole empowerment of being able to name yourself, and being part of a community that can name itself," he said.

He also commented that black issues are often marginalized at gay events.

"I feel like when I go to a gay [event], I can only be gay," he said. "It's inappropriate to talk about racial issues." It for this reason, he said, that he is trying to establish a group on campus for queer people of color.

Jones agrees with black lesbian writer Audre Lord, who once famously commented that, "There is no hierarchy of oppressions."

"Sometimes oppressions are one and the same," he said. "There's a common element that continues to marginalize people, because of sexual orientation or race."

Everywoman's Center not just for women

By Chaz Levi-Nielsen
Collegian Correspondent

Located in the lower level of the Wilder building, the Everywoman's Center is a non-profit, multi-service institution. All services are free and confidential, and though the focus of the center is female students and woman's issues, it is open to all members of Hampshire County.

"We focus primarily on issues of concern to women, but many of these issues are also of concern to men, families, anyone," said Carol Wallace, Director of the Center. "People can come in or call the Everywoman's Center with just about any concern you could imagine because we have a resource referral program and provide short term counseling."

The resource referral program is an information referral service, and is the primary program of the Everywoman's Center. It is a comprehensive list of resources available to those who cannot be helped directly or immediately by the Center.

The program's intent, Wallace explained, is networking.

"[The program] connects people on campus to resources in the community, and connects people in the community to resources on campus," Wallace said. "We feel it is important to get men involved, particularly to educate other men, and raise awareness about violence against women."

The Center also provides the only free short-term counseling service in Hampshire County. Priority is given to Five College students and people without insurance or an ability to pay. The counseling service is staffed by graduate students, and supervised by a licensed clinician. Referrals to licensed practitioners and health agencies can be given for those women who cannot be seen due to the high demand for the counseling service.

The Everywoman's Center also offers self-defense courses and violence prevention education. Students and interns staff the Counselor/Advocate Program after completing a 70-hour training program.

The Center provides a 24-hour hotline for the victims and survivors of violent acts against women. They are available to provide support and counsel to those in need.

The Educator/Advocate Program provides workshops and training for those interested in self-defense and prevention of violence. The Rape Aggression Defense [RAD] courses offered through the Everywoman's Center, in cooperation with the University Police Department. Certified instructors lead the RAD courses.

President addresses Congress and nation

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

President George W. Bush addressed the nation in a joint session of Congress last night commending the continued rescue efforts and reiterating America's resolve to fight terrorism all around the globe.

"Our war on terror begins with al Qaeda, but it does not end there. It will not end until every terrorist group of global reach has been found stopped and defeated," Bush said. "Every nation, in every region, now has a decision to make. Either you are with us, or you are with the terrorists. From this day forward, any nation that continues to harbor or support terrorism will be regarded by the United States as a hostile regime."

Receiving applause from both political parties, the President listed the demands that the United States was making upon the Taliban which included to deliver leaders of the al Qaeda hiding in their country, to release foreign individuals, to hand over terrorists, and to give the United States access to all terrorist training camps. He explained to both Congress and the American people that Afghanistan's cooperation was important in the fight against terrorism and that if they did not support the United States, they would be dealt the same type of punishment from the country that the terrorists would face.

"There are thousands of these terrorists in more than sixty countries. They are recruited from their own nations and neighborhoods, and brought to camps in places like Afghanistan where they are trained in the tactics of terror," Bush said. "They are sent back to their homes or sent to hide in countries around the world to plot evil and destruction."

The President also offered words of hope to the American people and appreciation for the support of other countries and their leaders, including British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who was in attendance during the address.

"We have seen the state of our Union in the endurance of rescuers, working past exhaustion. We have seen the unfurling of flags, the lighting of candles, the giving of blood, the saying of prayers – in English, Hebrew, and Arabic," he said. "We have seen the decency of a loving and giving people, who have made the grief of strangers their own."

Advocating for fair treatment of all Americans, the President asked for tolerance on the part of the people of the United States towards citizens of Arab descent.

"I ask you to live your lives and hug your children. I know many citizens have fears tonight, and I ask you to be calm and resolute, even in the face of a continuing threat," President Bush said. "I ask you to uphold the values of America, and remember why so many have come here. We are in a fight for our principles, and our first responsibility is to live by them. No one should be singled out for unfair treatment or unkind words because of their ethnic background or religious faith."

Taking time out to commemorate those who lost their lives during the tragic events, the President introduced Lisa Beamer, the wife of United Airlines flight 93 passenger Todd Beamer. Beamer was one of the people on board the flight that attempted to take the plane back in order to save American lives. The President commented on Beamer's actions calling him, "an exceptional man."

Bush also clutched the badge of a police officer fallen in the line of duty in his hand, emotionally explaining that, "I will not forget this wound to our country, or those who inflicted it. I will not yield. I will not rest."

Security in the Capitol was heightened during Bush's address due to recent threats of attacks. Vice President Dick Cheney was absent from the speech for security reasons, as was a member of the Cabinet.

Sikhs face backlash in Texas

By Maureen Kane
The Battalion (Texas A&M Univ.)

(U-WIRE) COLLEGE STATION, Texas - Images of Osama bin Laden have become a familiar sight to many people around the world since last week's terrorist attacks on the United States. Photographed wearing a turban and long beard, bin Laden has come to symbolize terrorism for many people in the United States - but according to Dr. Chenan Singh, head of the electrical engineering department at Texas A&M University, this conception is wrong.

Singh said that men who are part of an Indian religion called Sikhism are becoming targets of retaliation for the attacks because they wear turbans and long beards that resemble those of bin Laden and other Muslims.

Sikhism is very different from Islam, and Sikhs disagree with the actions of bin Laden, he said.

"The ironic thing is that if you see someone wearing a turban or having a beard in the U.S. or western countries, he's almost for sure going to be a Sikh and not a Muslim," Singh said. "Muslims don't wear a turban outside of their native countries. Only Sikhs do because it is part of their religion."

Although he has not experienced any problems, Singh said he is aware that the threat of violence from individuals who are unaware of the difference between Sikhs and Muslims.

According to Singh, on Saturday, a Sikh was shot and killed in Mesa, Ariz., in what he calls a case of "mistaken identity," and many others have been harassed in Houston.

"I am not worried because I think this community, College Station, is more educated, but there are other incidents," he said. "We would like the people to be educated about who we are. It's a sad thing anybody should be harassed in the aftermath of these things. A lot of the people from the Middle East are really decent people who shouldn't be harassed, but Sikhs have nothing to do with it."

Ruhi Singh, a senior biomedical sciences major, is also Sikh, but unlike Chenan, she is worried about Sikhs becoming targets of retaliation.

"Sikhism is a religion about peace and protecting the innocent and fighting for justice," she said. "It should be totally clear that Sikhs are peace-loving people that have nothing to do with terrorism acts in the United States."

Ruhi worries about her family and friends being mistaken for Muslims because they wear turbans.

"People discriminate in really subtle ways," she said. "I have a friend doing his master's in computer science. He hasn't gone to work in three days because he is scared to go to campus for fear of some crazy person coming by and beating him up or shooting him."

Ruhi's uncle, Waheguru Singh, is a research scientist with Lynttec. He said that he also is worried about being a target for retaliation and has friends in Houston who have been harassed because they have been mistaken for Muslims.

"I don't know if I should be worried or not," Waheguru said. "I like not to worry because I think people are decent here; it should be okay. But based on what is happening in the rest of the country, there is some kind of apprehension in our mind because of our appearance."

He said he has been keeping out of public places for fear of retaliation.

"People see the turban, and since we appear like that (bin Laden), it is normal for people to mistake us," Waheguru said. "That is why we need to educate them."

Waheguru said he believes no one wants to intentionally hurt Sikhs. Crimes against Sikhs are a case of mistaken identity, he said.

Ruhi said that no one should be targeted for retaliation for these attacks, regardless of religious affiliation.

"We need to urge Aggies not to act in anger toward fellow Americans," she said. "I know people are very angry, but backlash isn't the way to deal with it."

Speaking from the Oval Office on Wednesday, President George W. Bush told reporters that no one in the United States should "pit religion against religion."

"We don't view this as a war on religion, in any way, shape or form," Bush said. "There are millions of good Americans who practice the Muslim faith who love their country as much as I love the country, who salute the flag as strongly as I salute the flag. We're going to lead the world to fight for freedom, and we'll have Muslim and Jew and Christian side by side with us."

Minnesota city is number two

By Robyn Repya
Minnesota Daily (U. Minnesota)

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS - Minneapolis residents have a reason to be proud. Their city this week was ranked the second "coolest" in the nation by a Wisconsin-based consulting firm.

San Francisco took the top spot on the survey, called "The Jobs N Cool Communities."

The cities were ranked on a variety of factors: water and air quality, public parks and trails, restaurants, art galleries, museums and population diversity.

Minneapolis Mayor Sharon Sayles Belton said the ranking doesn't surprise her.

"It's a great place to live and work," she said.

Sayles Belton added the city will benefit greatly from the ranking. She expects people to flock to Minneapolis for both business and pleasure, she said.

"It will do much to bolster our reputation worldwide," Sayles Belton said.

The mayor said San Francisco's ocean border and large bridges helped it nab the top ranking.

Mayoral candidate R.T. Rybak said Minneapolis's new status is a reflection of all the "cool people" in the city. Second place isn't sufficient for Rybak, however.

"I'm not satisfied with number two," he said. "Next year we're going for number one."

Portland, Ore. resident and former University of Minnesota student Barrie Shortell said he is skeptical of the ranking methods. Portland was ranked fifth.

"Coolness is all very relative on who's determining what coolness is about," said Shortell, 20.

Shortell, who lived in Minneapolis for two years, said he thought the city ranked high because it experiences all four seasons. He also said the financial support for artists was a positive aspect of the city.

Northampton hosts third annual walk for cancer

By Esther Suh
Collegian Correspondent

The third annual Light the Night Walk will cover Northampton with glowing balloons and huge crowds of people, all to help fight cancer, on Sunday, Sept. 23 at Look Memorial Park.

This walk, to benefit the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society, will help fund research towards possible cures for blood related cancers such as leukemia, lymphoma, Hodgkin's Disease and myeloma.

"This (walk) has a really powerful statement," said Laura Hoag, the campaign manager for the organization. "Working for this cause has made it easier waking up and going to work."

Different contributions from individuals and corporations will help the organization raise money for curing cancer. The walk raised $60,000 last year, and this year's goal is to raise $115,000 more.

Registration is free, but a donation of $25 will be granted with an illuminated balloon from the Society. Registration will begin at 4:30 p.m. at the park in Dow Pavilion, and the walk will be at 6:30.

The Society is the world's largest group dealing with funding research and helping to improve the quality of life for its patients. It is a private organization that is exclusively dedicated to cancer research.

"We're known as the best kept secret," said Sherman.

Sherman said its most current project is supporting the research for Chronic Myelogenous Leukemia (CML). Recently, the Food and Drug Administration approved a new drug called Gleevec, formerly known as Glivec or STI571, as a treatment for CML. Dr. Brian Druker led the way for this breakthrough with Novartis, which manufactures and distributes Gleevec and helped open the drug for the markets.

"It helps attack only the unhealthy cells and not all cells," said Sherman. "This is a new paradigm with anti-cancer drugs."

According to the organization's website (http://www.leukemia-lymphoma.org), blood-related cancers such as leukemia and myeloma begin in the bone marrow, and others such as lymphoma originate in lymphatic tissues. These cancers are related because these cells all have similar functions and origins while growing uncontrollably.

These diseases, the organization stated, is often the result of an acquired genetic injury to the DNA of a single cell, which turns malignant and then multiplies continuously. If the concentration is too large, it affects the body's ability to fight against infections.

New cases of cancer are discovered every five minutes, according to the Society. There is an estimated 109,500 people in the United States who will be diagnosed with a form this year. Leukemia, lymphoma, and myeloma will cause an estimated 60,300 deaths in the United States by the end of this year.

The Society invites all to participate in the lives of cancer survivors and raise more funds along with awareness.

Benefits and improvements go specifically towards education about cancer through booklets and literature, said Sherman. Support groups such as First Connection help patients speak with cancer survivors. Patient aids, which help people financially, are also imperative components of improving the quality of life for patients and their families.

The Society is proud to be one of the top-rated voluntary health agencies that help fight against cancer. It claims that survival rates for leukemia have tripled in the last 39 years due to its research. The organization's continuous research includes its recent $7.5 million for Dr. Druker and his team to conduct further research.

National security or personal liberty; civil rights group concerned in NM

By Geoff Grammer
The Round Up (New Mexico State U.)

(U-WIRE) LAS CRUCES, N.M. - Following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., many Americans want action- and they want it now.

It is that immediate call for action that worries those associated with the American Civil Liberties Union.

"We certainly are concerned with the kind of incursions made into our civil liberties that are made in the name of heightened security and heightened protection," said Peter Simonson, Executive Director of the ACLU of New Mexico.

The "incursions" Simonson spoke of come in the form of racial profiling by law enforcement authorities, vigilantism from citizens and the invasion of privacy of American citizens.

New Mexico State University Chief of Police Lou Cabot said his department does not use racial profiling in their day-to-day operations and what happened Sept. 11 would not change that.

"We're being alert; alert to any situation, but we do not target individuals based on race," Cabot said.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is taking the same approach.

"It doesn't matter what race a person is," said Doug Beldon, supervisory special agent of Albuquerque's FBI office. "If he or she committed a federal violation or is alleged to have done that, we investigate it."

Even if law enforcement officials aren't using race as a factor in their work, the ACLU fears many people are taking the law into their own hands and doing so.

Cabot said although there has been talk of multiple incidents in the NMSU community, Sunday's reported attack on a university research assistant has been the only reported case of racial violence at NMSU since the terrorist attacks.

"There have been many rumors, but Sunday's incident is the only that has been substantiated," he said.

The ACLU, long-time legal advocates of victims targeted because their ethnicity, religious affiliation or lifestyle, has said they will continue to defend the rights of those people who become targets in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks.

"We can't allow ourselves to be baited into targeting people on the basis of presumed ethnicity or religious beliefs," Simonson said, "particularly when physical characteristics have no connection with the kind of political ideologies that were behind the attacks that were committed."

On Monday, United States Attorney General John Ashcroft urged Congress to pass legislation allowing federal law enforcement agencies more power in using wiretapping techniques when investigating suspects. By doing so, Ashcroft feels federal authorities would be able to do a better job of preventing acts of terrorism.

The ACLU isn't convinced that wiretapping is a successful tool in investigations and the group feels it too often violates the civil liberties of those not involved in the investigation.

"I think, in general, wiretapping is a dubious tool for counter-intelligence because it often winds up covering a broad scope of people who are innocent bystanders," Simonson said.

Ashcroft said he feels the limitations in place currently are hurting federal authorities.

"There are areas of our laws and procedures which give us better tools against organized crime and against illegal gambling, than we have against terrorists," Ashcroft said.

In a press release issued Monday, the ACLU's national Executive Director, Anthony Romero, reiterated his organization's desire for Congress to act in a deliberative fashion.

"Terror, by its very nature, is intended not only to kill and destroy," Romero said. "Terror is also designed to intimidate a people and force them to take actions that may not be in their long-term best interests. If we allow our freedoms to be undermined, the terrorists will have won."

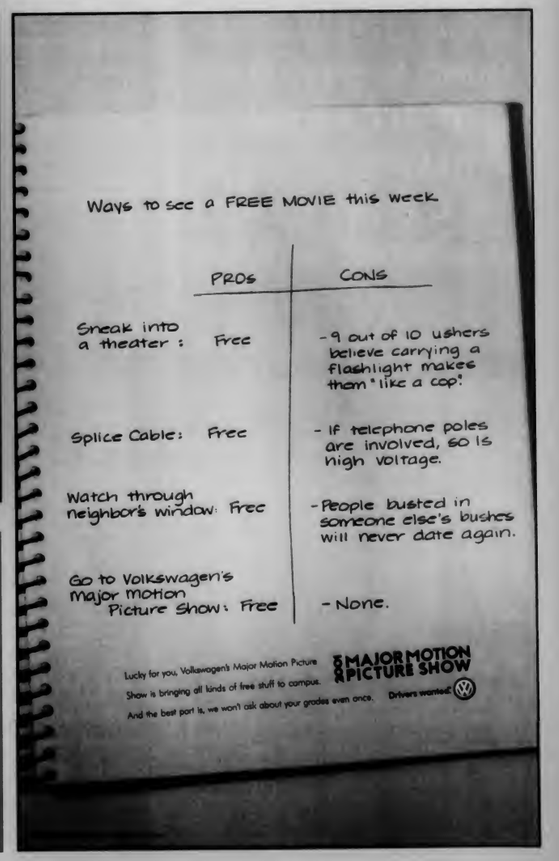
enthusiasm for today's elections.

"I'm positive that we're going to receive more than the five percent student vote required; I think were going to get 12 to 15 percent," Saunders said.

Elections ballots will not only hold the names of individuals running for Senate seats, but three referendum questions as well.

The first question will be asking for student opinions on the surveillance cameras located on specific residence halls on campus.



The second will be regarding an increase in the student's activity fee, which is currently an added $75 a year on every student's tuition bill. If approved, the fee would increase by three dollars per year, raising the total fee to $78 dollars.

Referendum question three will be regarding the already-approved decision to convert the campus to two electoral districts: on-campus residential and commuter. Previously, the student body was separated into three districts: on-campus residential, on-campus non-residential, and commuter. Last year's Senate passed a motion for the change and was then approved by the Coordinating Council; however, under SGA policy, the opinion of the student body is necessary.

Students can vote today for the SGA Senate at the Worcester, Franklin, Hampshire and Berkshire dining halls, as well as in the Campus Center. Tables will be open from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., and from 4 p.m. to 7 p.m.

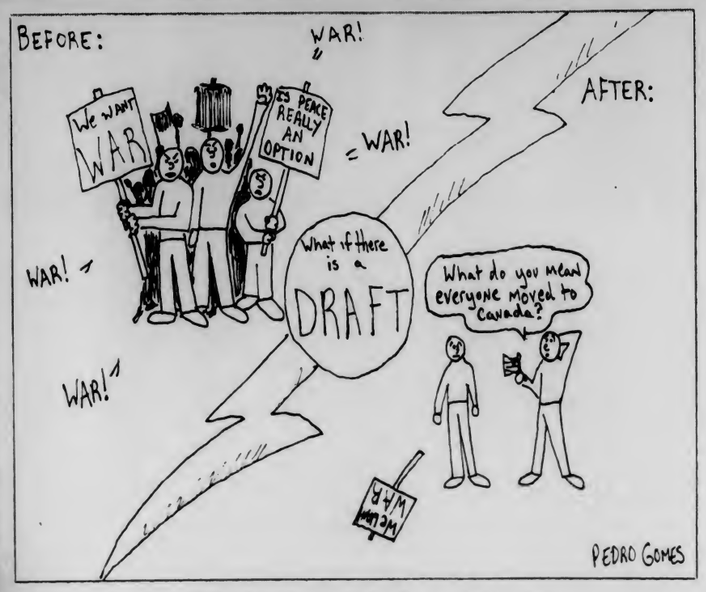
Moving on:
words from the SGA

Since Tuesday, September 11, 2001, our campus as well as our entire nation has been in a state of shock. The sheer images of destruction, the symbolism of hate and terror is beyond belief. While we have tried to internalize what has happened in the past days and come to terms with the extreme loss of life and destruction, we cannot allow these horrific acts of terror to precipitate into episodes of violence and racism. All students at UMass share a common bond, regardless of our race, ethnicity, gender or nationality. We all watched the events of Tuesday unfold. Chances are in the past couple of days that we all gave someone a hug, a pat on the back, or a reassuring nod not only for the other person's comfort, but for ours too. We all have had the same feelings of fear, grief, sorrow and confusion. We all have felt this way, because we are all members of the UMass community, and beyond that, we are all people.

As a result of last week's tragedy, we must remain in constant support of each other and not allow our anger to manifest into hate. Though many speculations have been made about who is behind these horrible attacks, we must not allow our judgment to affect our actions. It is easy to point fingers at those who are of the same ethnicity and/or creed as the group the U.S government has chosen as their prime suspect. However, we must be patient and wait for the situation to unfold in order to find out who's really behind this horrific act.



Already we have heard the horrific rumors of hate and racism directed at people of Middle Eastern decent, as well as those of the Muslim faith. We need to let these members of our community know that they are safe. We need to know as a community that no one on this campus is responsible for the events of Tuesday. No one on this campus should be held even remotely responsible for the devastation of the past week. We cannot afford to be divided; we cannot afford to fight amongst ourselves at a time when we truly need each other.

This terrible act of violence has affected us all: Blacks, Whites, Jews, Muslims and other ethnic groups around us nationwide. We must remain a strong and supportive community not only for the families of the victims of last week's tragedy, but for each other as well. Although we all grieve in our own ways, we must not let our grief turn into the hatred and hostility, which will tear at the fabric of our campus community.

God bless, and thank you for your strength.

SGA: in a little while?

KEN CAMPBELL

Student Government Association elections are today.

Maybe.

The SGA, once again, has failed to secure enough Elections Commissioners to conduct the elections. Legally, that is.

The SGA's Constitution and By-Laws, which it supposedly holds sacred, specifies that you need to have one Commissioner per polling station.

There are five polling stations. There are two Commissioners.

The elections, the SGA says, will go on. "Capable" people will serve, even if not officially approved Elections Commissioners.

Which all sounds fine, if you've never heard of the SGA until now.

The problem is that this same thing was done last year, when Jim Eltringham was Speaker, and Jeff Howe was President. A little history lesson:

The same problem happened last year, but it was compounded by the fact that accurate numbers of the student body couldn't be determined until after the elections.

Those elections got thrown out.

The reasons? Well, many were cited, but one of them was that Jim didn't make sure there were Elections Commissioners at the polling stations. They didn't have enough then, either. So, the elections were thrown out, and chaos ensued. Political infighting, the scope of which I wish I could say the campus hair never seen, erupted between several factions of the SGA.

The interesting thing to come out of this was a new Senate. A more representative Senate, supposedly. They didn't really do too much though.

Well, now we have a new administration, John Sheehan and Jon Laubinger, who have led the SGA admirably through this time of crisis, along with long time SGA disciple and back room deal-maker Aaron Saunders.

It's a really interesting and hypocritical note that Gabe Tavarez, Attorney General/Secretary of Finance, or whatever his title is this week, used to be Chief Justice of the Student Judiciary. He's the guy that threw out the other Senate that said you HAVE to have real Commissioners at the polling places.

How do I know all this?

Well, I used to be in the SGA. I retired last year for good, tired of the political posturing and bolstering of egos. Granted, I wasn't completely clean, but there are some folks still kicking around in SGA with more skeletons in their closet than John Wayne Gacy.

Don't take this as a bitter indictment of a new regime – I looked forward to a new SGA, but it seems as though the current decision of the Coordinating Council is just business as usual.

It holds up its By-Laws and proclaims them to be law, the way of the government, but it's okay for it to break them. As long as you agree with Aaron Saunders politically, you're all set. You can break any rule you want it seems, so long as no student objects.

The students should object. It is utterly ridiculous to have a student government that speaks from both sides of its mouth. We get enough of that from the real government. Why should I waste my vote in another "illegal" election? Why should anyone?

I realize the importance of having a Senate, of having student representation to the administration from all areas of campus, but to say one thing one year and go back on it the next year is completely duplicitous and shallow.

Attention UMass students – you're not getting the representation you deserve, and if this sham of an election is allowed to proceed, then you won't be getting it then, either.

What really needs to happen is more time. There is a vicious cycle of blame – no Area Governments means no appointments to the Elections Commission means no elections which means no Area Governments. The Coordinating Council can break it by just approving the assistants as Commissioners. But oh wait, that's not exactly specified under its powers. But since it is apparently okay to break the By-Laws and every other law in order to fulfill Comrade Saunders's wishes of a Senate of his very own, then it should be no problem to push the elections back a week.

It's ridiculous that our election system is going to be based on a principle of non-objection. If students don't mind that they're breaking their own rules, then they probably won't mind that if this election goes as planned; it's a testament to the duplicity of Saunders and the old guard SGA. It is hypocrisy in government at its worst.

I could, but I won't, go through our archives and bust out quotes where Saunders rails against Eltringham after Gabe's decision, stressing the importance of following the rules.

Now, the rules don't matter.

It's all about the students, supposedly, but as long as the students don't complain, then its fine to break the rules. We're here for the students, the SGA says, but only if the students don't mind the SGA talking out of both sides of its mouths, holding the students' hands in comfort while kicking them at the same time.

I had hoped, as John and Jon said, that this would be a new year, a new SGA. It seems as though Saunders's ego-driven thirst for an election and Senate, and the lack of true character on Coordinating Council to oppose him will make Lars of Sheehan and Laubinger. Whether Jon and John realize it or not, the Legislative branch of their Civics class experiment is poised on the brink of throwing the whole works into disarray.

Push the election back, SGA. Follow the rules that you yourselves hold so dear. If you start off on this foot, it won't be long until the SGA is once again a punch line in some professor's joke.

Ignorance is no excuse

JAMIE LOO

While walking to class last Friday, I overheard two people talking about a table in the Campus Center urging students to steer away from racism. The two men talked about how this wasn't an appropriate time for Arab and Muslim students to set up a table in the Campus Center because of the wrongs "their people" had committed. Hearing that conversation even take place here at UMass made me so angry. As our grieving continues, many people have sadly turned their sorrow into hate. Violence against people who are Middle Eastern has been happening across the U.S. Pig's blood was splattered across the doorstep of an Islamic community center. College-aged men holding an American flag were throwing rocks at a mosque. These images cut deep into my heart.

I can't claim to know what Muslim and Arab students are going through right now. I imagine it is fear for the safety of their friends and loved ones. It also must be intense confusion since skin color becomes the sole factor determining whether they are American or not. The only feelings I can talk about are my own personal experience of racism and profiling, specifically when the Chinese spy plane incident took place last spring. For the record, I am a naturalized U.S. citizen and just as American as anyone else. There was a lot of anti-Chinese sentiment in the U.S. surrounding the incident, which made me nervous. I received a lot of dirty looks from people on campus, but nothing that was too alarming to be concerned about my safety. Whenever I picked up a newspaper there were political cartoons depicting the "evil Chinese," with slanted eyes and buckteeth. One of the many cartoons I still remember is a cartoon showing the plane being lowered into a giant take-out box, with a man standing next to it saying, "Well, that's how they want it to go back to the U.S." What was even better was seeing the media's attempts on television and newspapers at interpreting Chinese culture to explain what was going on. I watched while commentators butcher the ideal of honor and "giving face," using colorful Asian terminology such as saber, firecrackers, and martial arts terms.

I read an article from The Washington Post which included a poll that was supposedly conducted before the incident on how regular Americans view Chinese-Americans. The poll found that 45% of Americans believe Chinese-Americans are spies.

Spies?

I wonder if my fellow classmates at this university, people who don't even know me, look at me and think I'm a spy. I am ashamed to say that my Chinese proficiency stinks. How can I be a spy for China when I barely speak the language?

And then there is Pearl Harbor. Though Pearl Harbor is something from our grandparents time, I still get comments. These comments stem not just from people our grandparents' age but other college- aged people and people my parents' age, who weren't born yet either. The only true crime I have committed is that I was due to be born in July, but instead was born in August, the anniversary of the bombing of Nagasaki, three days after the bombing of Hiroshima. And that was a crime against humanity the U.S. inflicted on Japanese civilians, not the other way around.

At times I've feared for my safety because of Pearl Harbor. One time while out late with my friends I received a comment from a rather large, threatening man. We waited until he got into his RV, which had a POW sticker, a small American flag and a Confederate flag flying off the back, before we pulled out of the parking lot. Unfortunately, he was waiting around the corner. Luckily, I knew the area and avoided streets with stoplights and managed to get through a few yellow lights but he followed. He tailgated me for some time before disappearing completely. It was around 2 a.m., and if anything happened the only people that probably would have been around would be my friends. I had just turned 18 a few days prior to this and was sick to my stomach that it happened. It really proved to me how deep racism can run, that a man, probably in his late forties to early fifties, would go out of his way to scare a teenage girl and her friends.

The friends I had with me that night were not Asian, and we have never really talked about what happened. They have said they were upset about what happened and wished they had said something before he got in his car, and yet a piece of me wonders if in some way they sympathize with the man. That somehow it's ok for people to associate anyone of a certain ethnicity with the crimes "their people" have committed. When the movie Pearl Harbor came out last May, my automatic reaction was to hide. I didn't even know the plot but just the words "Pearl Harbor" made me think of that man driving around the South Shore in his RV, possibly gunning for anyone Asian. There are people out there just like him right now. I still haven't seen the movie nor I have received any more comments about Pearl Harbor since the movie was released. My friends wouldn't let me stay at home but we did limit our outings so I could be home at midnight for about 2 weeks after the movie's release.

Though I hid, a part of me questioned why I didn't go and protest outside the movie theater or live my life normally. I have grown up saluting the flag, learning American history, and even in some ways forsaking my skin color as the language of my parents slowly slips away in my memory. The first essay contest I won in high school was for an essay on democracy and freedom. I am American and this is my home. I should be able to feel safe. Arabs and Muslims in the U.S. shouldn't be afraid to live their lives normally, but their skin color will not allow them to right now. We are the ones at fault for this; other Americans who believe it is ok to take our anger out on them are responsible for this fear. Racism is a cycle and unless we change, the children and grandchildren of our Arab and Muslim classmates are going to have to live in the shadow of September 11, the way Asians my age still live Pearl Harbor. At this sensitive time we must remember that our Arab and Muslim classmates are just as deeply affected by this tragedy as we are. Icy stares and paranoia are not the American way. I did not bomb Pearl Harbor, I am not a spy and my fellow Arab and Muslim Americans should not be viewed as terrorists.

Bluegrass finds fans in the northeast with youthful new groups

Bluegrass gets sass with young new bands like Railroad Earth... ... and The Yonder Mountain String Band.

THE YONDER MOUNTAIN STRING BAND plus RAILROAD EARTH
Pearl Street
Sept. 13

On Thursday night, September 13, a mass of sweaty bluegrass fans enjoyed a phenomenal show put on by two amazing bands. Opening the show was the very talented Railroad Earth, a six-piece band formed from the remnants of a few now-defunct bands. With members from rural southern Pennsylvania and western New Jersey, you have to wonder where these guys picked up their bluegrass talents. This newcomer on the scene will soon be a force to reckon with. After performing this past summer out west at some high profile festivals, including the famed Telluride Bluegrass Festival in Colorado, and the High Sierra Music Festival in California, the band is traveling throughout the Northeast picking up new fans as they go. With more performances similar to that at Pearl Street, they will certainly become very popular. They performed a very tight, well-rehearsed set to the small crowd who were lucky enough to have arrived early. To see when they are coming around again, be sure to check out their web site at www.railroadearth.com.

After a very quick set change, The Yonder Mountain String Band took the stage. One of the first things that one notices about Yonder is the absence of drums, which is otherwise the backbone of the average band, no matter what the genre. The beauty of the Yonder Mountain String Band is that they are one of the only bands that can pull this off due to its sheer skill matched with its unusually popular style of bluegrass. The only explanation that I can come up with for the band's unlikely popularity (as large amounts of bluegrass bands have failed at creating such a wide appeal for this genre) is its youth, matched with its high energy level. When thinking about the actual differences between the opener, Railroad Earth, and Yonder Mountain, I could not come up with anything except their age and marketability. For whatever reason, they have been able to create for themselves a name, when many bands just couldn't – and they put on one hell of a show.

With funny on-stage banter between songs and the band's musical interactions while playing, it was possible to see very clearly how tight and well-practiced these friends are together. After traveling from a Wednesday night show in Buffalo, NY, the band was noticeably excited to be playing in the mid-ranged Pearl Street Clubroom, especially after selling out at the Iron Horse on their last tour. The first set progressed very quickly as Yonder performed a number of very rapidly ending songs with an absence of any major jamming. Of particular notice was a song titled "Moon-Rocket Ship," a fast paced banjo-driven tune that really whipped the near capacity crowd into a frenzy. Towards the end of the set, you could get a sense that the band was officially warmed up as they lashed out into an extended jam, which somehow meandered to an end with the Allman Brothers famed "Whipping Post."

From the moment the band stepped onstage for the second set, you could immediately sense the higher energy level from both the band as well as from the crowd. There were very many highlights from this set including a feverish jam culminating with acoustic guitarist Adam Aijala and mandolin player Jeff Austin facing off at center stage during what I believe was the song "Hit Parade." This lengthy set ended with an excellent jam accentuated by the steady bass playing of Ben Kauffman, matched with the exuberant playing of David Johnson on banjo. With Johnson's roaring banjo solos throughout the show, on top of Kauffman's steady thumping bass, it was easy to forget about the absence of the drum kit.

Overall, I can say that I thoroughly enjoyed this show. For me, it was a welcome change from the normal groove-jazz show, where all of the usual instruments play their normal roles. At times I couldn't help wonder how this different brand of music had made it all the way to the east coast with such rave reviews, but at other moments I was thoroughly impressed with the precision orchestrated onstage. As Yonder Mountain is still in its infancy being only a few years old, it will be interesting to see how they forge forward and further innovate their unique blend of "fun bluegrass music."

DreamCatcher catches bad review

Steven King's latest novel tells the morbid tale of the Easter Bunny and his brush with a chainsaw murderer.

By Jake D. Lewis

DREAMCATCHER
Stephen King
Scribner Books

It won't come as a shock to anyone that the primary character in Stephen King's latest novel DreamCatcher was once the victim of a gruesome car accident. King's similar near-death experience two years ago has obviously traumatized him beyond the physical, and perhaps, in some form, DreamCatcher is a work of psychological healing.

In DreamCatcher, King returns to his old stomping grounds, both in the physical sense, with the town of Derry (where It and several other novels are set), as well as the horror genre which first made him a brand name. The plot involves an alien spaceship that crash-lands, and the fungus-like disease that spreads as a result, in an Invasion of the Body Snatchers sort of way. King's traditional sayings are still intact ("f—arrow," "doodlysquat") but his heart just doesn't seem to be in it. Just when the reader is getting settled into the first 100 pages of what seems like a bloody good time, the novel totally changes course and goes downhill for the remaining 600 pages.

Every winter since they were teenagers, four men reunite in a cabin in the woods of Maine to hunt and talk about old times. Each of them lead pretty miserable, pathetic lives, but their annual get-together is something that they look forward to despite it. This year, however, a terrible snow storm comes their way, and with it the appearance of a stranger whose body has been serving as host for an alien parasite. Not long after, King vividly describes in gruesome detail, the moment this serpentine life form is born forth from the man's emaciated body. One would then think that, judging from King's modus operandi for horror in the past, the novel would be about the four men trying to outrun, and later defeat, the invaders in the snowed-in woods. This might have been formulaic, but at least far more enjoyable than the scenario that does prevail, about a crazy U.S. Army general seeking out the "dream catcher," or rather the tie that binds the four men to the alien power in some way – and then trying to destroy it.

The dream catcher, we're told early on, is more than the Native American web-like ornament that hangs on the wall of the cabin to ward off nightmares. The symbolism there is obvious, the nightmare being the alien intruders. The real dream catcher is "Duddits," a kid with Down syndrome who has passed along some sort of magical power to the four boys when they rescued him from a violent attack as a child. In true King tradition, there must be a character with some supernatural ability, and the irony of bestowing this gift to someone with a handicap is not beyond the reader. Yet the power that he possesses is not well defined nor explored. At the beginning of the book when this power first shows up, it appears that it could be some sort of ability to see things that no one else can. For example, a character named Jonsey finds a woman's lost keys in a most awkward place in a parking lot. Later on, there's evidence that the power may lean more towards being capable of blocking one's thoughts so the aliens cannot take over his mind, as Harry, our protagonist, is competent of doing. Or, it may be both - a conglomeration of magical powers that take on many forms. In either case, there is no accurate description of this mysterious gift and it leaves many questions to the events that unfold in response to it.

What is clear is the mission of the possibly insane Army general, Abraham Kurtz. He has been assigned to cordon off the infested area and kill all the "gray men," as he calls them. However, he takes it upon himself to also eliminate all the humans who have been infected, which includes himself. It poses an intriguing question: Is Kurtz looking out for the best interest of the country? – no, of the world? – by containing the virus to one area, or is he raging mad by killing innocent humans? King leaves it to the reader's judgment, but he sprinkles factors along the way that make you lean towards the latter, such as when Kurtz cripples his second-in-command for questioning his authority. The military subplots are a pleasant divergence from the horror on occasion, but the novel soon becomes more about the politics rather than the suspense, and that's not what King readers want. If government deception was what one wanted to read, the new Tom Clancy book could suit you just fine. The reality of the situation, though, is that there are few thrills and chills beyond the first third of the book when two of the primary characters get killed off. From there on, it's fair to say that King's psychotherapy goes into effect.

Western Massachusetts residents may find some amusement in the final act of the novel, as all people involved to this point race towards a familiar locale, the Quabbin Reservoir (as well as stops at real locations along the way). Since water represents life in literature, it's not wholly surprising that the aliens deem this their location to deposit the virus in order for it to spread to the surrounding communities (as a result of this notion, security was beefed up at Quabbin to allay fears). As the war game is played out to its conclusion, some of the pieces start to come together while others begin to split apart. By this point, one only wants to finish the book and move on. Now it's not only King's heart that's not in it, but the reader's as well.

With the addition of an epilogue, it is apparent that King has tried to sum up all the previous action for the lot of us who are left scratching their heads. Suffice to say, it doesn't quite work out. Something is lost in the transition from King's angst-ridden brain onto the page, perhaps due to the fact that he wrote the entire novel by hand while in the hospital. Through DreamCatcher, King has calmed his personal demons. The only problem with that, though, is that there are none left to haunt the reader.

Bjork's Vespertine soars with intricate sounds and lyrics

By Michael Delano

BJÖRK
Vespertine
Elektra

There's a kind of pure, innocent beauty to the white jewel case packaging of Björk's Vespertine that becomes even more striking after listening to the album. It looks like a broad, blank canvas just screaming for something to be done with it, kind of like the computer screen I'm staring at right now.

The songs of Vespertine often feel the same way, as if Björk approached them all as a wide-open space she couldn't wait to explore and get lost in. Some artists establish a groove early on in a song and ride it out to the end, waiting patiently for their time cues to chime in with vocals or instruments. Björk, on the other hand, expands into the song like the wiry organic drawings in the lyric booklet. She shoots off into all directions, rarely going where you expect her to, filling and emptying space as her voice floats along.

Occasionally, she'll mark and double back to a chorus, like on "Hidden Place" or "It's Not Up To You," just to remind us she can create a static pop song if she feels like it. But more often than not it's the verses that are most grabbing, since Björk has a way of enunciating syllables whenever and however she wants, not so they'll fit nicely together. As on the first couple of listens of all her albums, the approach can be jarring to the listener, who is unable to settle into any sense of comfort with the delivery.

But repeated listens always illuminate the very careful and masterful placement of words and sounds, so eventually, like those wacky paintings in the booklet, you begin to discover more and more of the intricacies. After you have that little grasp, you can really dive in to the words and music, both of which are stunning on Vespertine.

Eerily subdued, minimal beats and ghostly string arrangements provide a hazy background for Björk's voice, and the cumulative effect is often one of contradiction. Matmos, the indie soundsmiths that will accompany her on tour, with a group of other programmers produce some incredibly creative loops and beat arrangements that feel small and unintrusive. Their sound holds steady for most of the tracks, offering a point of return from her wildly unpredictable and powerful voice, as well as from the sometimes-overstated string sections.

COURTESY INEZ VAN LAMSWEERDE AND VINOODH MATADIN

Björk wins the evening gown competition at this year's Miss UMass.

The contrast suggests the enormity of the domestic aspects of everyday life. Björk has commented that on this album she wanted to use a variety of household sounds, and the feel of Vespertine does suggest grand ideas coming from unexceptional places.

"If you wake up/ And your day feels broken/ Just lean into the crack/ And it will tremble ever so nicely/ Notice how it sparkles down there," she sings on "It's Not Up To You," even though love seems to be the dominant theme, such a passionate approach to life is apparent in many of the songs, which promote happiness above all. "It's not meant to be a strife/ It's not meant to be a struggle uphill...undo/ If you're sweating/ undo/ if you're crying," says "Undo."

"I have grown my own private branch," Björk announces on "Unison." Her branch of music is a remarkable one, never repeating itself, always jutting into new places, sprouting beautiful buds as it goes.

Reality, Movies meld

By Todd Weiser
Michigan Daily (U. Michigan)

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. "This is something you see in a movie."

Last Tuesday, the nation was shocked to turn on their television sets and see horrific images of destruction, disaster, and tragedy without the comfort of a movie preview surrounding them. These images were not computer graphics; they were really happening. But how long did it take most people for this to really sink in?

Eyewitnesses and others who helplessly watched the recent tragic events live on television could not help but express disbelief at what their eyes were conveying. The images of the World Trade Center towers being struck and later collapsing have in the past seemed more suitable for the world of big-budget action movies than for real life news shows.

Going to the movie theaters every weekend, viewers see people die. They see buildings, ships, and airplanes blow up with people in them. Sometimes, we even cheer when these events occur. However, most of the time we just gape in awe at these amazing, fantastical images presented on the screen. This is entertainment. Instead of worrying about all the loss of life in these special effects, audiences stare in astonishment at these events, which could surely never happen. Yes, the White House blew up in Independence Day, but that is just science fiction, right? The White House will last forever. Audiences have also seen terrorists hijack the President's plane in Air Force One and terrorists rampage New York City in films like The Siege and The Peacemaker. As a result of these films, the images that are now playing on TV stations everywhere are not as extraordinary as they could be.

Destroying popular monuments and buildings in films has become a trend in Hollywood. The World Trade Center and the Pentagon are two of the most visible American monuments that have not received any abuse in recent disaster films. But it is for was possible that a film in the future could have had an image of the World Trade Center imploding or the Pentagon being attacked. In fact, the setting for the finale for Men In Black 2, currently in production, was not only supposed to be the World Trade Center, but these scenes had already been shot. (The ending for this film has since been changed and will be re-shot).

Now, the question being asked is if seeing buildings blow up in movies almost every month has desensitized people to the real life images of this tragedy and others like it? Never has such a national disaster had more images than the recent attack on America. This time there are not just pictures of the aftermath and of the rescue effort. And there is not just one piece of footage of what happened like in the case of the JFK assassination and the Zapruder film. This time there were a myriad of amateur photographers shooting the incident with their video cameras. On the day of the incidents, CNN and other stations kept showing viewers new images and angles of the planes entering the buildings and of the eventual collapse. We saw video from people standing at the foot of the towers as debris comes rushing down upon them. Then they would show a new angle of the crash, but they would slow it down so we could examine every split second before impact. America watched on in horror and awe. These images told the brutal truth of what happened that day and they were indisputable. Yet, watching these pictures many people could still not believe what was happening, and they did not want to. Could it be a bad dream? Could it be scenes from a new movie? But that fateful answer kept filling their heads, "No."

Seeing images of violence and death on movie screens and on cable TV has made these pictures almost common place for Americans, especially younger people who have never experienced or witnessed such a national tragedy before. However, a tragedy of this magnitude must elicit deep emotions in any viewer. Young people, like college students all over the country, have only seen images of destruction on this kind of level while at the movies. Moreover, no matter how many films you have watched, you have probably never seen horrific images this real before. No, the images do not contain blood or gore but the loss of life is still evident and undeniable. That is not just an empty plane entering an empty building, people's lives are at danger, and people know this while watching. While it may be true that countless Americans have become desensitized to many images that appear on the news everyday, when a tragedy of this scale occurs no one can remain unresponsive. You cannot discount these events as normal news. Unlike the images that are viewed in America's theaters and are easily forgotten days later, the sight of planes colliding into these towers will never leave the minds and memories of everyone who sat by their TVs last Tuesday.

The future of America and the actions it will take against the people responsible for the attacks is in question. At the same time, the future of cinema and the images it portrays may also be in limbo. There will now have to be a certain sensitivity and self-censorship in Hollywood movies not only to help their films be successful but also out of respect for all those who lost their lives in this disaster. This carefulness will not last forever and Hollywood will ultimately return to showing extreme acts of violence that may draw comparisons to the recent events; though this may seem insensitive, it is actually just the country moving forward and recovering.

While remembering the past events and the people involved is very important, it cannot dominate America's thoughts forever. Going to the movies will be a diversion for people and a way to enjoy life again. The movies have always been an escape for people from their daily troubles. During these difficult times, they may become even more important for many Americans as people try to put their grief behind them and spend enjoyable times with their families. There will be entertainment, again.

THE PRINCESS DIARIES
Directed by Garry Marshall
Starring Julie Andrews and Anne Hathaway
Playing at Cinemark 12

Disney generally has a good track record with family films – if they're of the animated variety. Even at their most formulaic, the studio has rarely produced an animated film that was outright bad (with the exception of glum, dour "historical" fiascoes like Pocahontas and The Hunchback of Notre Dame). The story is different with its live action contributions. Tepid, juvenile and built from torn pre-packaged notions about "family value," these films are designed for the people who don't care if a movie is good, as long as nothing bad happens.

Which makes The Princess Diaries a welcome exception. It's the rare Disney live-action movie that doesn't feel as if a Windows screenwriting program hacked it out. Yes, it's predictable. But it's also smart, funny and charming, a quality lacking in many of the vanilla constructs the studio has always released.

The story plays on every little girl's fantasy of being a princess, which makes it an ideal movie for little girls. But it is also plays well for the entire audience, peppered with little quips that adults will get even if children don't (such as when a pair of bushy eyebrows are referred to as "Frida" and "Kahlo"). It may be Grated, but I'm not ashamed to say I really liked it.

Mia Thermopolis (luminous newcomer Anne Hathaway) is an awkward 15-year-old who lives in a boho, redesigned firehouse in San Francisco with her single, artistic mother. She hangs out with her friend Lilly (Heather Matarazzo), who hosts a cable access talk show, and is good at "being invisible." One day, she gets a visit from her paternal grandmother (Julie Andrews), who turns out to be the queen of a small European country called Genovia. Mia is the princess and the only living heir to the throne after her father dies. The family didn't want her to find out until she was eighteen, but circumstances lead everyone to reveal the truth. The country's future may be in jeopardy if Mia doesn't claim her royal title.

Everything that happens is easy to predict. Mia agrees to take "princess lessons," but doesn't have to take the throne unless she wants to. Word gets out at her snooty prep school, and soon she's hanging with the cool kids (including pop singer Mandy Moore), unaware that Lily's brother (Robert Schwartzmann) likes her. Her life falls into disarray and soon she's ready to chuck the whole princess thing.

What makes the movie sing is the fact that everyone involved tries to lift the movie above its flaws. Director Garry Marshall reigns in his penchant for broad humor and schmaltziness (prevalent in films like Dear God and The Other Sister), while writer Gina Wendkos gives the screenplay an intelligence most children's films lack (surprising considering Wendkos' last screenplay was for the facile Coyote Ugly). But even with their contributions, The Princess Diaries could've been one of those films that was unbearable without the right actors. Marshall hires reliable comic stalwarts like Heston Elizondo and Larry Miller for supporting roles, and Matarazzo is in fine form. But the awards go to the leads. Andrews makes a wonderfully regal queen and Hathaway is a real find. She has the Julia Roberts smile, the same vulnerability and the same comic timing. She just might be our generation's Julia, and the next Hollywood princess.

Lost ace won't stall UMass

By Michael Meagher
Collegian Correspondent

After having its opening match against Amherst College postponed last Tuesday, the Massachusetts women's tennis team is set to open its fall season. The Minutewomen begin their year-long quest to defend the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship this weekend at the Eastern Collegiate Tournament in West Point, N.Y. before opening up conference play on Oct. 1 at Fordham.

UMass is coming off of its best season in school history. Besides taking the Atlantic 10 crown for the first time, it earned a spot in the NCAA Tournament where it was bounced by a powerful Arizona State team in the first round. While the sweet taste of success is still fresh in the Minutewomen's mouths, UMass must now face the challenge of higher expectations on the courts. With most of her key starters back from last year and two sensational freshmen on board, Head Coach Judy Dixon seems to have put all the pieces in place to get back to the NCAA's and fulfill those expectations.

There is little doubt that the Minutewomen will be right in the mix when tourney time rolls around. However, the Maroon and White will have to get back to that level of play without its best player from last year. Francesca Mancini, voted the Most Outstanding Player in the Atlantic 10 last season, has left Massachusetts to return home and live in her native Italy. As a freshman last year, Mancini played first singles and lead the team with a 13-6 record at that position, including two big wins in the conference tournament.

"This is a huge loss for us," coach Dixon said. "But we feel like we will be as good, if not better than last year. The kids feel like they are the team to beat in the conference."

The Minutewomen have plenty of reason to believe that they can return to the glory of last season. Two of those reasons come in the form of a couple of highly touted freshmen who are expected to fill the void left by Mancini. Playing first singles is Stephanie Price, a sensational baseliner from Missouri who Dixon feels will be able to step into Mancini's shoes. At second singles will be Sasha Edelstein, a freshman from Israel.

"They are both very strong players," said Dixon. "It would be great if they could step in and play at the top two singles spots."

With two strong but young players leading the way on the lineup card, Dixon will look to the more experienced players to lead the team emotionally through the ups and downs of the long college tennis season.

Expected to make great contributions on and off the court are a pair of seniors and a pair of sophomores. Sophomores Jafra Depontes and Susan Hyams are expected to play in the third and fourth singles spots, while seniors Lindsey Gillooly and Helena Horak will fill in at fifth and sixth. Also expected to see some playing time are sophomore Caroline Larson and freshman Ashley Smith.

"They know what it takes to get back there [to the NCAA's]," Dixon said. They feel like there is more pressure on them this season, but if we stay hungry and stay healthy we can be better than we were last year."

Most coaches use the abbreviated fall season to break their players in and prepare for the spring season. With the two freshmen at the top of the lineup, Dixon wants to use the fall as a time to get healthy and help her players become accustomed to one another.

"Jafra has a case of tendonitis and Sasha isn't ready to step in just yet," Dixon said. "Once we get healthy and get everyone on the court we will be ready."

Looking ahead, other concerns have come up. One of them, Dixon says, will be the addition of Richmond to the A-10 slate.

"Richmond will be an extremely tough team to beat this season," Dixon said. "They have eight scholarship players and we only have five. They could be the team to beat by the end of the season." Overall, the fall should be an exciting time for the Minutewomen. Their resiliency will be tested in difficult conference play, but they are ready to take on the rest of the A10 – a year-long showdown that should prove to be well worth watching.

Francesca Mancini, last year's No. 1 for UMass, has decided to stay in her native Italy.

cautionary reasons, with the Minutewomen already up 3-0. In her place junior Andrea Trujillo filled in admirably and put relentless pressure on the Bearcat defense.

While the midfield will key the UMass attack, the Rams will look to a pair of seniors to put pressure on goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky and the rest of the Minutewoman defense. Forward Shannon Kittleson and midfielder Catherine Zanni have accounted for three of the Rams' seven goals this season, all of which have been game-winners. In last season's win over UMass, Zanni contributed a pair of assists while Kittleson added a goal.

Cook will once again be called upon to marshal the back line for the Minutewomen and quell the attacking options for Zanni and Kittleson. She was solid against Binghamton, winning a number of headers and limiting the number of the Bearcats chances as well as starting many of UMass attacks with long balls from the back. She will need to produce an equally commanding performance on Sunday if the Minutewomen are to pick up a key conference victory.

Whatever way you look at it, Sunday's encounter is sure to be a hard fought battle and could go a long way to deciding the A-10 regular season title.

Wednesday's game.

"For us to continue, the key players are making sure we get good plays off our backs," Koch said.

The Minutemen will play Maine just prior to starting a wave of A-10 conference games. Hardcore teams that threaten post-season action like Rhode Island, Fordham and LaSalle will soon come in October and the Minutemen are ready to match up against them.

"We're excited to start conference games on the road to the A-10 tourney," Koch said. "That's our number one goal and we can't do anything else without that."

The Minutemen will take Totman Field at 1 p.m. on Saturday against the Black Bears.

In the past week, the Minutemen have worked hard through practice and now aim to get back into the focus of soccer. The team has not slacked in showing its support for America; since Wednesday, UMass has worn black armbands and should be wearing the same American flag patch that Major League Soccer teams sport now. Koch said that the team will be showing its patriotism in the postseason by giving blood. The Minutemen are also in talks now with the University of Hartford about a possible benefit game with proceeds going to the relief fund, in order to make up for the cancelled game last Sunday.

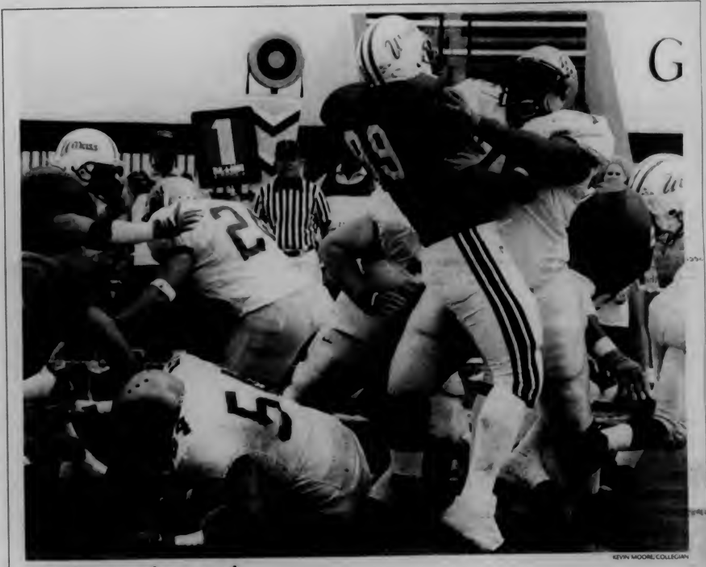
win of the season. Head Coach Amy Robertson's group has found the enemy net exactly once this season, courtesy of a Kayla Bashore shot in the first game of the season against Miami (Ohio).

Three straight shutout losses have followed for the Hoosiers, including a 3-0 blanking at the hands of Holy Cross in Worcester and a 1-0 barnburner at home against Stanford. The latter was deadlocked at 0-0 before going to penalty strokes, at which the Cardinal prevailed 3-1.

Despite its dumb luck, Indiana isn't a team that Shea and the Minutewomen are willing to take for granted.

"We have to come out and compete no matter who we're playing," Shea said. "If you don't bring the energy, the emotion, for a full 70 minutes, you can lose to anyone." An added factor with which Shea must contend is the fact that Robertson, though 1-16 in a season-plus at the helm of IU, first tasted collegiate field hockey glory as a player in a very familiar uniform.

The year after Shea helped UMass reach its first NCAA Final Four in 1983, Robertson began a career with the Maroon and White that would culminate with the program's second Final Four trip in 1987.



But rather than feel intimidated by her coaching counterpart's field hockey pedigree, Shea is intent on putting aside her personal relationship with Robertson until the final whistle sounds.

"You don't coach any differently just because the other person is a good friend," Shea said. "Yes, Amy knows a great deal about the game and came from a great tradition and history of winning. But you just go out and coach your game."

UNEASY RIDERS

Field hockey hits road for weekend double dip

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

If time is indeed the great teacher, the Massachusetts field hockey team must be a bunch of geniuses by now.

As if 17 days between games weren't enough, the Minutewomen had to endure a 14-hour bus ride in order to get to Ann Arbor, Mich. for their double slate this weekend. The Maroon and White (1-2) squares off with the fourth-ranked Wolverines at 4 p.m. today, then retakes the field at 11 a.m. on Saturday against Indiana.

In light of the air travel complications brought on by last week's terrorist attacks, the team elected to leave Wednesday morning via motor coach and thus caused a reshuffling of its weekend schedule. The original slate had the Hoosiers (0-3) lined up for Saturday morning and host UM (4-2) waiting in the wings for a Sunday game.

The Minutewomen didn't exactly choose the open road as their best route to the Great Lakes region, according to Head Coach Patty Shea.

"With all the delays going on at airports, it probably would have taken us just as long to fly," said Shea, who downplayed the two-day trip's consequences in regards to performance. "Something like this only affects you mentally if you let it."

Instead, the team will likely welcome its first actual competition since Boston College invaded Amherst back on Sept. 5 (a game that UMass won, 2-1, for its first victory of the season). After receiving only three total points and failing to crack the Top 25 in last week's Coaches Association Poll, the Maroon and White needs to get a few more games under its belt in order to start climbing the totem pole of national field hockey respect.

"We've only played three games, so being unranked at this point really isn't unprecedented," Shea said. "Most teams have played at least four or five games by now.

"We're looking at this as a kind of restart to our season."

What better way to restart than against the Wolverines, who have posted shutouts in each of their four wins this season? Head Coach Marcia Pankratz's crew has already bested three ranked teams (No. 2 Old Dominion, No. 10 Louisville and No. 12 Virginia) and hasn't allowed a second-half goal this season.

Even in their losses, the Wolverines have looked rather impressive: UM fell to top-ranked North Carolina by a lone goal on Sept. 8 and dropped a 3-2 heartbreaker to No. 7 Wake Forest in overtime to open the regular season.

"No doubt they're a great team, but you have to play the best if you want to be the best," Shea said.

The best of the best, at least when it comes to the Wolverines, is freshman forward Adrienne Hortillosa. Each of the California native's team-high three goals has been a game-winner for UM, which places her atop the Big Ten Conference in decisive tallies.

A freshman scoring leader is about all that Michigan has in common with the Hoosiers, who limp into Ann Arbor still searching for their first

UMass won't be kept out of service

By Elena Panesis
Collegian Staff

After a solid 12-8 finish in the regular season last year, the Massachusetts men's tennis team fell just short of the Atlantic 10 crown, losing to St. Bonaventure in a hard-fought title match.

But second place is far from shabby as the Minutemen enjoyed their best season in team history, making short work of key rivals like Duquesne University in a 7-0 shutout and squeezing past Xavier University 4-3 in a pivotal match that brought UMass to the Atlantic 10 finals.

The A-10 also recognized No. 1 Steve Prisco and No. 2 Brent Davis as members of the All-Conference squad for their outstanding singles play.

All were great feats for Head Coach Judy Dixon and her crew, a team that defied all odds – particularly injuries.

Unfortunately, the Maroon and White will embark upon its 2001-2002 campaign in a similar state. Sophomore Ron Theis, who fills a vital spot in both the singles and doubles lineup, will sit out the fall season due to a herniated disc in his back. Senior captain Prisco, who brings much experience to the squad, has also battled back problems and just returned to practice this week. Moreover, the team suffered a blow when sophomore star Davis opted to stay in his native California to play closer to home.

"We'll definitely be missing Davis since he transferred," Theis said. "He was a vital asset to winning most of our matches last year. I was also heartbroken when I heard the news about my back because I really wanted to contribute more than I did last year. It came as a real shock.

"Yet, I think the two incoming freshmen will step up big and succeed in the heart of the line-up."

Coach Dixon added two new faces to the No. 4 and 5 slots of the starting line-up with freshmen Scott Sanschagrin of Northern California and Reid Stubbs of Fort Myers, Fla.

The freshmen are fitting in well though there's always that initial shock to college life," Dixon said. "It's my job as a coach to have them work on their confidence throughout the fall season. Freshmen rarely come in and play their best tennis and unfortunately I cannot take my time with them because of injuries. Yet, I expect them to play better in duel matches when they aren't facing their teammates."

Eric Reblin, another crucial component to the lineup, makes his return after sitting out a year after transferring from the University of Texas. He and seasoned veteran Todd Champeau comprise the second doubles tandem while Prisco combines with Reid at the No. 1 slot. Returning sophomore Phil Rodrigues and Sanschagrin round out the play as the No. 3 doubles pair.

"I feel good to get out there and play again since I had to sit out for eligibility reasons," Reblin said. "I'm really excited to play and I feel that we already have a strong team bond with the freshmen Reid and Scott. It should make for some great doubles play."

On Saturday, the UMass squad journeys to Williamstown, Mass. for its first test of the fall season as it battles Williams College, the Division III National Champions, and Binghamton College, whom the Minutemen have fared well against in the past.

"With the Williams match, I feel we have our pride on the line," Champeau said. "It won't affect us record wise but we don't want to lose to a Division III school."

"I'd say we have a slight edge against Binghamton given our history with them and our psychological edge coming off a great season," Dixon said. "The question is, can we win with a team that is so green and with our No. 1 player injured? Our goal is to win two matches this weekend which will establish us as a fairly solid team."

Women's soccer makes its pitch

According to Sarah Cook, the captain of the Massachusetts women's soccer team, practice just isn't her "cup of tea." She would much rather be playing games.

And finally, after six days of practice, Cook will get her "tea time."

Exactly one week after an impressive 6-2 victory over Binghamton University, UMass returns to action on Sunday afternoon when it hosts Rhode Island. The Minutewomen will look to make it two consecutive wins at Totman Field when they take on the Rams in what will be the Atlantic 10 season opener for both sides.

The two teams lost in the semi-finals of last season's A-10 Championships and both will be looking to get off on the right foot in this year's campaign.

UMass (2-1) coach Jim Rudy will be hoping that his squad can harness the positive momentum from the Binghamton win and exact a measure of revenge on URI (3-1) for the Rams' 3-0 win over the Minutewomen in Kingston, R.I. last season.

"It's really important [to carry the momentum over] because we lost two games [last weekend] that were going to be big for our strength of schedule index," Rudy said.

With its strength of schedule lessened from the cancellation of the Georgia and Auburn games, the Maroon and White can't afford a let down against the dangerous URI squad.

"Rhode Island is going to be a heck of an opponent," Rudy said. "They are a big team and very athletic. [URI] is at you all over the place."

In order to pick upsits second straight victory, UMass will once again need to keep possession for long periods and allow its midfielders space to move the ball and create chances. Seniors Katelyn Jones and Brooke Bartlett on the flanks were much more impressive against the Bearcats than they were in the previous match, a 3-0 loss to Connecticut. Those two, along with fellow senior Kat Machmer and junior Martha Conover in the middle, compose a strong midfield that will look to put the Rams defense on its back foot.

Conover has been especially impressive so far this season with her play in the center of the pitch en route to tallying a team leading four assists.

"[Conover] has a high work rate, a high energy, and [she causes] high anxiety for the other team [because] she is so busy," Rudy said. "You have to be aware of where she is all the time and that's basically everywhere."

The only worry for Rudy and his squad in the midfield will be the health of Bartlett. Bartlett, who plays out on the right flank, injured her ankle in the first half of the win over Binghamton and did not return in the second stanza for pre-

O'Quinn spelling goose eggs for opposition

Last season, it took the Massachusetts men's soccer team 98 minutes to beat Maine. The decisive goal came just with just over seven minutes left in the first overtime.

In this Saturday's rematch with the Black Bears, the Minutemen will look to make their move just a little bit faster than that.

UMass is coming off a shutout against New Hampshire on Wednesday, and it's looking for more. The team has crept back into the swing of things this week and is feeling a little better about what it has to face up against for the rest of the season.

Saturday's game against Maine will be one of the last non-conference games for the Minutemen on the road to the Atlantic 10 post-season.

Goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn had a stellar performance on Wednesday and has been providing the team with what it needs to survive; Head Coach Sam Koch praised O'Quinn for keeping the net clean despite feeling a lot of pressure, and went on to suggest that the rest of the team will need to start stepping up to take some of the load off.

"It was a well deserved shutout for him," Koch said. "He's done a great job."

Forward Jeff Deren will be needed on the front against Maine after a slow game against UNH. Deren had a scoreless game against the Wildcats but should provide stronger footing this time for UMass.

"[UNH] wasn't one of his better games," said Koch of Deren. "He needs to be more active. I'm confident he'll do better on Saturday."

Shawn Green nailed the first goal against New Hampshire after 75 minutes of play during Wednesday's game. Green has been a solid back for the Minutemen and is expected to help get things started soon against Maine.

Fred Kinateder is another strong forward who has pulled a lot of weight for the Minutemen this season. Kinateder has been a major asset in moving the ball up the field and crossing to the corner, both strategies that have resulted in needed goals.

"Kinateder is a key player for us," Koch said.

John Lytton, a junior back who has been extremely important to the success of the Minutemen this season, is questionable for Saturday's game. Lytton suffered a slight concussion when he was hit in the head during a colllsion in

The Jeffery Amherst Bookstore is one of several businesses that may face competition when chain book store Barnes and Noble opens their Hadley franchise later this year.

Large book chain spells concern; local stores say competition may be tough

By Elizabeth Pariseau
Collegian Staff

News that book retailer Barnes and Noble plans to open a new location next to Wal Mart at the Mountain Farms Mall on Route 9 has recently reached the Amherst and University of Massachusetts communities.

Reactions in and around Amherst, a community traditionally more supportive of small local businesses over international chains, have been mixed.

English Professor Margo Culley, who regularly orders books for her classes in American and Women's Literature through Food For Thought books in Amherst, said in a written statement, "these national chains contribute to the homogenization of America's taste in reading."

Senior English major Katelyn Ludwig said she has a different impression of Barnes and Noble, of which she said she is "a big fan."

Among the things Ludwig said makes Barnes and Noble more appealing than the smaller independent shops is the in-store café, where patrons can relax and read, and she said that in her experience, Barnes and Noble offers a wider range in reading than the smaller stores.

This opinion is controversial in Amherst.

"Though Barnes and Noble may seem to have a lot of books, their range is actually quite narrow," Culley said. "If you want progressive political commentary, experimental new fiction and poetry, or literary and cultural criticism, you will have to look elsewhere."

Among those who say they share Culley's opinion are the owners and managers of the small bookshops in Amherst's central business district.

Atticus Albion Bookstore Manager Nat Herold pointed out that "the town as a whole has more titles," than a Barnes and Noble superstore, despite the "myth" of Barnes and Noble. "the image they have...of having any book [customers] could want." He said he felt that Barnes and Noble projects the image that they "have a better inventory than they actually do."

Though several UMass students, including senior English major Tim Lettney, have said they are concerned with the impact the opening of the new superstore will have on the independent bookshops, Mitch Gaslin, co-owner of Food for Thought Books, said that "he wasn't too concerned," and that there is "a certain amount of inevitability" connected with the expansion of a company like Barnes and Noble.

"They have a cookie-cutter approach to a community," Gaslin said. "Losing that local feel to business isn't good."

Gaslin also cited the Amherst community's long track record of supporting local businesses, and points to the swift opening and closing of a McDonald's Express as well as a D'Angelo's sub shop in Amherst center in recent years as trends that brighten the outlook for the smaller shops.

"If you had asked five years ago, you may have gotten a different answer," Graslin continued. "Now, we [in the smaller bookshops] are much more content with how we are doing our jobs."

Indeed, it seems that what Herold called "a spirit of friendly competition," among the local bookstores has strengthened each business. According to Herold, "there is some overlap, but [each bookstore has] its own niche."

Herold expressed concern about some of Barnes and Noble's business practices, saying that they "have money to burn," and can afford to "do deep discounting for a short while, which is not something an independent store can do, or is interested in doing, as a rule."

He said that this "deep discounting" can often drive smaller stores out of business. As soon as that happens, Herold contended, the superstores withdraw their discounts and reap a profit.

On the other hand, Herold said, there is a divide between the practices of those who control Barnes and Noble as an enterprise and those who work in individual stores.

"The people working at Barnes and Noble

Pentagon renovations saved lives

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

While the graphic images of the collapsed portion of the Pentagon are disturbing, experts say that it could have been much worse.

Pentagon Renovation Manager Lee Evey, speaking with reporters shortly after the attack, described how the renovation of the Pentagon kept much of the building together.

"Now, this was a terrible tragedy and people lost their lives. But I'm here to tell you that had we not undertaken this effort in the building, this could have been much, much worse," Evey said.

Renovation was just days from completion in Wedge One, where the American Airlines Boeing 757 impacted into the home of the US Department of Defense. The plane's path took it through Wedge One and into Wedge Two.

The renovations, intended to protect the building in case of attack, are credited with keeping the building upright long enough for survivors to get out.

"These two individuals were on the fifth floor on their hands and knees, but they crawled through every office on the fifth floor making sure that anybody that was alive got out," Evey explained. "They then crawled the same thing on the fourth floor, directly above where the aircraft impacted; the third floor; they crawled the second floor, to every single office, to make sure that if anyone was there who survived, that they got out.

"They couldn't get into the first floor, so they crawled out the building at that point. This structure held. It did not collapse for about 30 or 35 minutes," Evey added. "It gave them the time to do that and it gave people in the building time to escape the area. Even if they were injured, they had an opportunity to get out."

Steel columns erected every few feet along the interior of the outside wall of the Pentagon are bolted together through the five floors of the building, forming a support skeleton. Between the columns are sheets of Kevlar, a strong fiber used in bulletproof vests. The panels are there, Evey explained, to stop any debris from blowing into the offices.

"These white panels, that's a Kevlar cloth, the same stuff we make bulletproof vests out of," Evey said. "We interspersed the Kevlar in between the steel beams in the windows to catch any fragmentation that would result from a blast event."

New windows, of blast resistant glass have been added. Many of the windows of Wedge One, the renovated portion, remained intact, although many were displaced as a result of the collapse.

"What's interesting about this is, first, you still see the steel connected together and intact. And despite the obvious huge pressures to which this glass was exposed, the glass is still intact," Evey said. "Even though the building eventually collapsed, the pieces of glass are still, for the most part, in a single piece. They just kind of popped as the building came down.

"The glass is almost two inches thick. And we developed these win-

ALANA celebrates anniversary

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The Office of African-American/Latino/Asian/Native American [ALANA] Affairs' weeklong 25th Anniversary festivities culminated on Saturday night with a celebratory banquet.

Speakers at the event included Interim Chancellor Marcellette Williams, and Office of ALANA Affairs Director Nelson Acosta. Keynote speakers were Stan Kinard, the office's first director, the Rev. Paul Chandler, a University of Massachusetts alum and John Bracey, a professor of Afro-American Studies.

Acosta opened the evening by commenting that the banquet had almost been cancelled.

"Canceling it would have been the easiest thing I could have done," he said. "We were all very touched by what happened on Tuesday."

Acosta said that he was leaning towards cancellation until he met with alumni.

"One young lady said to me, 'we can not let them destroy our joy. They can destroy buildings, but not our souls.'"

After Acosta's speech, a moment of silence was observed for the victims of Tuesday's attacks.

Kinard, who became director of the ALANA office 25 years ago, when it was referred to as "The Office of Third World Affairs," spoke of the campus he worked at 25 years ago – one very different from the University of Massachusetts of today.

"My first year at UMass, there were only approximately 40 African-American students," Kinard said. "It was a culture shock. One could walk around campus all day, and if you saw a student of color, it was a joyous event.

"In 1968, the year Dr. King was assassinated, there was a series of racial incidents on campus," Kinard continued. "Black students were verbally abused and physically abused. We began to come together at a more spiritual level, and we mobilized. We took over Whitmore, and presented the University with a series of demands."

Among the protestor's demands was the creation of an African-American studies department. Today, UMass is one of the few universities in the nation to offer a PhD program in Afro-American Studies.

Other accomplishments mentioned by Kinard included the creation of the New Africa House, the establishment of a 5-College African-American Studies department and a surge in the number of black Registered Student Organizations.

Yet despite these improvements, Professor Bracey was quick to caution that much more progress is necessary.

"Let's look at what we haven't done," Bracey said. "Only two to three percent of students on this campus are African-American. That Is an absolute disgrace. We are whiter than the University of Vermont!

"We've lost more African-American faculty in the last two years than we've hired," he continued. "We haven't yet attracted large numbers of African-American faculty. We've got a long way to go to make this campus a place where students of color want to come. We've got a long way to go before we can be the utopia we're talking about."

Closing remarks were made by David Nuñez, a UMass alum, and former President of the Student Government Association.

Nuñez spoke about the many accomplishments of the ALANA Office over the years, but ultimately agreed with Professor Bracey that more work needed to be done.

"I have a challenge to students who are here now," he said. "It only takes one person to stand and say, 'we're going to get more staff, faculty, and administrators of color. We've got people all over the state that deserve to be here, and are being shut out!' I don't want to tell you what to do, but that's where I would start."

Pow Wow draws hundreds to Haigis; twenty second annual gathering a hit

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Participants came from all across New England for the University of Massachusetts' 22nd Annual Native American Pow Wow this weekend.

The event, held on Haigis Mall on Saturday and Sunday, included traditional Native American dancing and music. Recording artists Howard Lyons and Tom Obomsawin both performed. Craft vendors circled the Pow Wow tent, along with artists and political groups seeking signatures. Customary dishes, such as succotash, were served alongside more modern fare, like french fries.

"This is a cultural celebration," said Joyce White Deer Vincent, Director of the Dr. Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center at UMass, and one of the Pow Wow's organizers. "It's a time for us to come together, and be who we are, as Native people. We share our traditions, and hope to bring some aspects of the Native American people to the greater society.

"Even though we come from different nations," she continued, "the Pow Wow is an expression of our alliances with each other. It's an extended family gathering that extends beyond the lines of distinct nationhoods."

The Pow Wow was distinctly cross-cultural in its theme, although much of the event focused on the traditions of Northeastern Native Americans.

A Memorial Honor dance was held for those who were victims of the recent World Trade Center attacks.

"We usually have memorial dances for those who have lost somebody during the year," said Vincent. "This is also a way of acknowledging the tragedy that occurred. We hope to find a way for human beings to get past their hatred."

Vincent commented that, in recent weeks, many Native Americans have been mistaken for Arabs and verbally attacked.

"I would ask that people be mindful about anger and realizing that they may be lashing out at the wrong people," she said. "It's not going to heal."

Francis Huntington, a Connecticut resident, worked as the arena director for the Pow Wow. Huntington, who ancestry is Oneida and Mohican – "There is no last of us," he says, laughing – said he comes to UMass throughout the year.

"I come here to assure students that the Indian community is with them," he said. "All of the Native community of New England is here, if they need someone to talk to."

Huntington hopes that first time attendees of the Pow Wow "will grow to know that there's more than one group of people in this world. "If they come to know a little bit more about our culture," he said, "maybe it won't be so frightening."

A desire to educate others about Native American culture is also a primary reason why Debbie Spears Moorehead, her daughters Iasmine and Jackie and her son Cody, travel to Pow Wows across New England, where they perform traditional Wampanoag dances.

"I hope that the people who come get a better understanding, an experience," said Jackie.

The Mooreheads have been coming to the UMass Pow Wow for five years.

"The Native community knows what the Native community is doing, and the Native community goes to Pow Wows whenever there's a Pow Wow in the area," she said. "and Joyce puts on a good Pow Wow."

"There are several other Native American cultural events planned for coming weeks. On October 17, at 7 PM in the Student Union Ballroom, Ulali, a Native Woman's Acapella group, will perform a free concert. International Briefs

Israel – Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon ordered Foreign Minister Shimon Peres not to meet with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat yesterday because his term of a 48-hour period without fighting in the West Bank and in Gaza was not met.

According to Palestinian officials, the meeting would have taken place yesterday afternoon at the Palestinian international airport in southern Gaza.

As late as yesterday morning, Palestinians believed the meeting was confirmed. It was not until Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erakat was on his way to the site that the news of Sharon's cancellation came through.

Israeli right-wing ministers have been increasing their opposition against Sharon and the anticipated meeting due to the facts that the meeting would have taken place under fire and would have granted Arafat "international legitimacy," for he must still prove to them he is not a terrorist. The opposition went as far as the ministers' threats to quit the coalition had the meeting gone through.

However, Sharon has not ruled out the idea of the meeting completely. Instead it is reported that it would depend on real calm being restored for an uninterrupted 48 hours in the West Bank and Gaza.

Great Britain – A pedestrian on Tower Bridge in London recently spotted a human torso, stripped of its arms and legs, afloat the River Thames, leaving police officials with many questions.

River police salvaged the torso of the estimated to be five-and-a-half-years-old black Afro-Caribbean boy from the water near the Globe Theatre tourist attraction on the South Bank. The torso was thought to have been in the water anywhere between one and 10 days.

A post mortem examination at Poplar Mortuary gave the cause of death as a violent trauma to the neck area.

"The child died a very violent death. It's very tragic and traumatic," reported the leading investigator on the case, Det Supt Adrian Maybanks. "At this stage, I would like to reassure members of the London community that we will not rest until the person responsible has been apprehended."

The victim has yet to be identified, but officials are searching through missing persons files in hopes for a breakthrough.

Maybanks pointed to the orange shorts labeled 'Kids and Company' with German washing instructions on the inside found on the torso as a significant lead in identifying the victim.

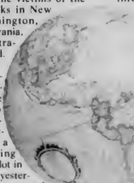
Official have been unable to find any more remains of the victim in the river.

Belgium – About 1,000 peace protesters marched through Liege with "Make Love, Not War" banners outside the barricaded European Union (EU) conference center where finance ministers discussed the effects of the hijack strikes in the US.

According to George Robert, one of the protest's organizers, the demonstration's "first principle is to be anti-war and refuse to participate in US action."

His concerns seem merited, for since the Sept. 11 attacks, EU member nations have pledged strong support for a US military action in retaliation for the terrorist attacks, and examples of this support are seen across Europe.

EU leaders recently supported the "targeted" retaliation against countries harboring terrorists at a summit in Brussels.



French President Jacques Chirac has said, "We will not sit on the sidelines of the battle against this scourge."

In addition, British Prime Minister Tony Blair has held a series of one-on-one meetings with national leaders even before the Brussels summit.

The Liege protestors feared military action against Osama bin Laden, the chief suspect for the attacks, would only result in even more deaths.

During the protest, the Liege police force kept a water cannon and anti-riot equipment out of sight of the protesters in order to maintain a low profile but at the same time be prepared in case things got out of hand.

After holding a minute of silence for the victims of the hijack attacks in New York, Washington, and Pennsylvania, the demonstration dispersed.

Indonesia – Two explosions were reported to have detonated on the second story of a busy shopping mall parking lot in east Jakarta yesterday, injuring several people.

After the blasts, police set up barricades to keep out the hundreds of curious bystanders while the bomb squad searched the Atrium Plaza Mall, which has been subjected to bombings in the recent past.

A police officer who identified himself only by the single name of Mingun said there were two blasts formally reported but some witnesses have told officials that they heard three explosions instead.

"I heard a really big explosion and then the manager yelled out that everyone should get out of the store," said Dewi Puspita Wati, an employee of the Matahari department store.

Police Chief of central Jakarta, Lieutenant Colonel Matheus Salempang, said the investigation squad began by trying to establish if the blasts were the result of bombs or accidents.

The last bombing that took place on Aug. 1 at the Atrium Plaza Mall, in which five people were injured, led to the arrests of a Malaysian citizen who was allegedly reported as belonging to an extreme Islamic group, and several Indonesians, who had been linked to bombing of the Christian churches and other buildings over the summer.

Officials also wondered if there could be a link between the explosions and the recent news informing that Indonesian President Megawati Sukarnonputri has held meetings in Washington DC with President George W. Bush and publicly supported his campaign against global terrorism, especially since almost 90 percent of Indonesia's 203 million people are Muslim.

China – Chinese authorities have placed the para-military People's Armed Police (PAP), an estimated more than 1.2 million people, on alert against terrorist activities along with other labors thought to undermine their nation's social stability.

In order to carry out this goal, the PAP officers are provided with weapons which are more sophisticated than those supplied in the Chinese police force.

Its specialized unites in large criminal gangs, quasi-terrorist groups, and underground fighters within separatist movements in Xinjiang and Tibet add to their anti-terrorism defense.

The PAP officers have also been attending special classes, in which the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington DC are analyzed in detail, in order to develop better strategies to maintain socio-political stability in their nation's cities.

Sources have reported that only a few days after the attacks, the Communist party leadership issued an internal circular on taking extra precautions against destabilizing factors in society.

"We must raise out guard against all groups that want to stir up trouble [for Beijing] by exploiting sentiments of dissatisfaction in society," the circular said.

Western diplomats in Beijing have reported that quasi-terrorist activities thought to have been the result of the Xinjiang separatist movement had taken place on "an on-again, off-again basis."

They cited the example of a railway line in the Henan province, which had been blown up this past July, leaving no reported casualties.

The Chinese government's efforts to crack down on the underground groups in Xinjiang and Tibet are seen as an act under the overall banner of joining the fight against global terrorism.

For example, the Lanzhou Military Region, those responsible for the Xinjiang area, have already installed more troops to the western-most areas of the independent region because of China's short common border with Afghanistan and the possibility of Muslim radicals slipping into the country after a full-fledged NATO offensive against the Taliban.

Ethiopia – Former Ghanaian President Jerry Rawlings arrived in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, yesterday for a three-day discussion with government and religious leaders on combating the spread of the HIV/AIDS virus.

The virus is now reported as the leading cause of death in sub-Saharan Africa. More than 25 million people living in the area are diagnosed with HIV/AIDS.

"We shall not let HIV/AIDS devastate the whole of the productive section of Africa and wipe out all [the continent's] skills," said Rawlings, who came to the country as a representative of the United Nations.

Continuing the discussion throughout much of Africa, he is scheduled to visit Tanzania and Kenya with the same mission.

Kazakhstan - Pope John Paul II journeyed to Astana, a region now facing potential war, to make a special prayer, advocating for Christians and Muslims to live together without violence.

"We must not let what has happened lead to a deepening of divisions," the 81-year-old pontiff said to the crowd of about 50,000 people. "Religion must never be used as a reason for conflict."

During the mass in Astana's central Mother of Homeland Square, the Pope made evident his hopes that the world would oppose massive wars as an end result product of terrorist actions, saying, "With all my heart, I beg God to keep the world in peace."

Adding to the tension in the air was the fact that Kazakhstan neighbors Afghanistan, the country in which suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden is allegedly located. However, the Pope chose to focus on how the Kazakhstan brings different cultures together.

"From this city, Kazakhstan, our country is an example of harmony between men and women of different origins and beliefs," the pontiff said,

"I wish to make an earnest call to everyone, Christians and the followers of other religions, that we work together to build a world without violence, a world that loves life, and grows justice and solidarity."

dows and the system, the steel framework to go around it, in conjunction with the Army Corps of Engineers," Evey said. "We did work with the Army Corps of Engineers, using the blast analysis group that they have, to determine what types of overpressures this building might be subjected to, and then try to develop a blast-resistant system to defeat that."

These types of reinforcements are nothing new, according to University of Massachusetts professor Scott Civjan. Civjan, a civil engineer, explained that terror attacks in the nineties influenced the way that embassies and other governmental buildings are built.

"The technology has been there for a while. There is a lot of work that is done with embassy design where they are trying to prevent terrorist attacks. There is a large perimeter around the building," Civjan explained. The embassy bombings, I think that raised the government awareness of government structures. Seeing how to better prevent these attacks, not only in the new structures, but in the existing structures."

The problem, Civjan explained, is that while you can design a building to absorb any amount of damage, the cost and feasibility of such a design makes it an expensive and infrequent choice.

"You can make things stronger and stronger and more ductile, but there's always a trade off of whether you really think it needs to be designed for that and how much it's going to cost," Civjan said. "We can design it so that it can support the loads of the building, but it's really hard to design it to prevent everything that could possibly happen."

For instance, Civjan explained, the Trade Center Towers were expected to absorb the damage of a plane crash.

"The Trade Center was designed for one plane, not as big as a 757, and with a fire at the same time. It wasn't so much the impact of the plane that caused them to collapse. It was the intense fire that was going on, the steel is going to lose strength, and though it was supposed to stand with the fireproofing in a normal fire," Civjan said. "But since this was such an intense fire and the impact probably knocked out some of the fireproofing. The upper stories fell, and then you have the lower levels trying to support all that weight."

While the renovations will continue at the Pentagon, to the tune of some 758 million for the remaining wedges, and untold millions to repair Wedge One, the rebuilding of the Trade Center Towers, and what steps will be taken to reinforce that structure remain to be seen.

"How you are going to rebuild that area is going to be very interesting. The first thing that jumps out at me is that the fire rating on very large structures. I think that's going to be the first thing to be addressed. I think the next thing is the ductility- that's up to the owners of the buildings," Civjan said. "I think there will be required ratings for certain types of buildings. I think government buildings will have higher regulations for design, I think buildings that people think are likely targets, like skyscrapers, will also."

are local people," said Herold. If Barnes and Noble isn't able to provide customers with a particular title, Herold predicted, the employees would be able to send people back to the local stores to find the item.

"In that way," Herold said, "[the new store] may actually help our business."

Moreover, Herold, Graslin, and Jeffrey Amherst Bookstore owner Howard Gerstin based a substantial amount of their confidence in their businesses on the special services that local shops have to offer.

"Traditionally, customer service is better at independent stores. There tends to be more knowledge about books," said Herold.

Barnes and Noble, he says, orders its books on a national scale, and lacks the resources for local specialization in the titles it offers. Though Herold predicts that the new Hadley store will "stock up on New England books... you can do that from three thousand miles away."

"[Atticus] has a good idea of what customers are interested in," Herold said.

Said Gerstin, "We have tremendous services to offer our customers that are not possible for a chain."

At Jeffrey Amherst, Gerstin said, these services include charge accounts for customers, year-round giftwrapping and textbook buyback, mailing services and mailing bags free of charge and, above all, friendliness.

The bookstore also specializes in writings by and about Emily Dickinson, and regularly cooperates with the Dickinson Homestead museum in town to offer tourists and residents current resources and information about the poet.

"We've had chains here before, so we're not concerned," Gerstin said. "I think people understand the advantages of shopping here."

This may not necessarily be the case for all members of the community, especially students on a budget.

"I spent $300 on textbooks this semester [at the smaller stores]," senior English and Education major Laura Desjardins said. "It's a little ridiculous, and it takes away from my other bills and responsibilities. If I can pay less for my books at Barnes and Noble, then I'll go there, because I need money for other things."

Ludwig said she felt that small local stores with fewer employees are "not equipped to handle the textbook rush." She said she would rather patronize Barnes and Noble for her textbooks, predicting that service at the larger store will be quicker.

Those in the business, however, were quick to distinguish between the textbook industry and the type of services offered by Barnes and Noble.

"It's a completely different world," said Graslin.

According to Herold, textbook sales at Atticus had benefited in the past from what he termed "corporate backlash." After the University Store was privatized by eFollett, he said, Atticus received "far more textbook orders than ever before" from professors.

He also pointed out that with its location off the bus routes and away from campus, the new Barnes and Noble will be "kind of out of the way to sell textbooks... a lot of students don't have cars, and it's not going to be accessible enough. Unless they create a shuttle, which isn't likely."

"The heart of our business is textbooks and students at the colleges," said Grestin, "and we have so much more to offer them."

Textbooks aside, Desjardins said her feelings on the new superstore are mixed because she said she prefers downtown Amherst's atmosphere for social purposes. Unlike fellow student Ludwig, Desjardins said, "I never go to the Barnes and Noble cafe, I'm not a cappuccino drinker. I'm there for the books.

"I do want to promote smaller businesses," she went on. She says she enjoys shopping for pleasure reading at Valley Books, a used bookstore in town, and Jeffrey Amherst.

Overall, the general effect of the new store may actually turn out to be somewhere between the "homogenization" predicted by Culley and the current difficulties cited by Ludwig and Desjardins.

"As someone who loves to read, I'm always happy to see a wider selection of books available in the Valley," said Assistant English Professor Stephen Harris, in a written statement. "It seems to me that the more book stores that come to the area, the more likely people are to get in their cars and come to the Valley to go book shopping.

"Holyoke Mall is not that far," he continued. "If people want to go to a Barnes and Noble, they can. By bringing one to the Valley, we keep the consumers here. That's good for everyone."

Karen Lynn, a four-year employee of Barnes and Noble in Holyoke who is slated to take the position of Store Manager in Hadley, expressed a similar opinion.

"When Barnes and Noble goes into a new location, they try to look to ways to expand the book buying market," she said. "[Barnes and Noble] seeks to offer a community more choices. Customers can choose where they want to buy their books."

Pragmatic approach

What Bush needs now

While President George W. Bush's decision making has been questionable over the past few weeks – he's often seemed more interested in cutting wrestling promos than political speeches – his decision to show the world the accumulated evidence against Osama bin Laden may be his most savvy to date.

If one complaint has rained down more than all others against Bush, it's that he's been disinterested in backing his fiery words with fact, choosing hyperbole over evidence. It would seem that the administration's new stance is an acknowledgement that, in these suddenly heady times, perhaps the pragmatic approach is better.

Perhaps nothing: pragmatism is better.

There is no reason to make decisions that leave the administration open to obvious broadsides from individuals still angry about last year's election or the perceived indifference that America has towards the rest of the world. There are very simple things the United States can do to keep the country focused on the same united goal.

If the evidence revelation will go over here in the United States, it will also no doubt soothe foreign critics who alleged that the our nation was simply acting out of petulant anger. Cold precision is what this situation calls for they argued. After all, who better knows about terrorism than the constant victims of it?

Bush can say all he wants that the United States is going to stamp out terrorism, but plenty of our allies will simply wait for us to learn: it is not that easy. From Basque separatists in Spain to Irish nationals in Great Britain, it is never as easy as simply hoping to rid the nation of terrorism. If the United States wants foreign support, it cannot make the same mistakes that our neighbors and allies have, at times, made. They have learned by this point and Bush has been forced to show that we have too.

We are relatively new to this situation after all. While constantly the silent observer, the shoulder for support, the encouraging friend, the United States has never had to look to others to do the same. Europe knows what we're going through; they also know how they want us to deal with it.

It would seem that Bush has taken the point.

But perhaps there is one more voice he should heed. As each day passes, it seems as if the United States has an ear more and more open to the voices of supporters, and their suggestions. The Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) has said that it will support any attempt to find Osama bin Laden or those responsible for the attacks. It warned, however, that any attack against Afghanistan, against innocent Muslims in the country, would be untenable. It likened such attacks to the attacks in New York City: basically, both would be terrorist acts against innocent individuals.

The GCC represents six Middle-Eastern countries: Bahrein, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates, Qatar and Oman. Their support would be crucial in any prolonged investigation into bin Laden and in any attempt to disrupt his financial or communication networks. They make a good point. The United States cannot simply become one "of them" if we hope to smite "them."

To quote Bush's father, 'we must draw a line' between them and us, and we cannot simply define them as Muslims or Afghanis. The release of evidence against bin Laden is one good step; heeding the warnings of our allies is certainly another.

BRIAN LOHNES

Typically advertising people are known for their savvy and smarts when it comes to designing and executing an ad campaign. I say typically because there are those few ads and ad campaigns that are either horribly annoying or just plain weird. Every company seems to fall into this trap from time to time. Chili's, which has just resurrected its godforsaken "baby back-ribs" song, is among my top offenders. So here, for all to see, is a list of the worst ads ever.

"The milk mustache ads" – Ok, this was cool when they actually had celebrities who were internationally known. Elton John...ahhh maybe that's a bad example. Britney Spears did them, the cast of "Friends" did one...just about everyone did. That's the problem. I am now left waiting to see Tina Yothers appear before me on the page with a milk mustache. Yikes. Secondly, have you ever seen anyone with a milk mustache like that? If you saw someone walking around like that you would think it was a birth defect.

"Kool-Aid Ads" – Let's set the scene. Kids playing, laughing, having fun, and then a gigantic red container bursts through a wall and begins screaming at them about Kool-Aid. What kid isn't going to drink it? I sure would, lest I be taken away by this gigantic red pitcher of liquid. Kids everywhere cower in fear when playing now because they are afraid they are about to be accosted by "the Kool-Aid" man. Not to mention the fact that the "Kool-Aid man" has been linked to several high profile South American drug cartels. How do you like dem' apples?

"Slim Jim Ads" – Sweet lord, what the hell happened to Macho Man Randy Savage yelling, "Snap into a Slim Jim!" while pinning an innocent 16 year-old boy down on a wrestling mat? Where are the good old days? Now we are left with some freaky artsy-fartsy interpretation of the human anatomy and how we digest food. These ads suggest that a Slim Jim will disrupt your whole digestive system, causing chaos inside your body. Come to think of it, these ads might be a disclaimer.

"Ads for cat food" (all types) – I may be bias on this one because I hate cats, but I hate owners that treat cats like (a) real people and (b) important real people. Your cat is a cat. If it weren't eating yesterday's beef stew in a can it would be killing mice, birds, maybe an insect or two and eating them. Your cat should not be eating food that is more expensive per pound than what you eat. These ads play cats up like they are all food critics. I bet if you put a plate of mice guts next to cat food, the cat is going for the guts. There is one ad where the cat is getting a portrait of itself painted and is then served food on a silver platter. See, it does sound even more ridiculous in print than on the screen.

> "[Miss Cleo] is no more Jamaican than I am Eskimo and she is about as clairvoyant as a glass of orange juice."

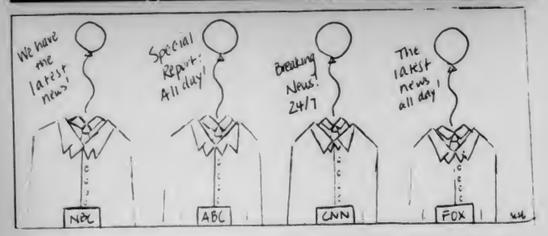
"Pringle 'Jam Band' Ads" – You know the ones where the group of idiots drums away on Pringle containers to pass the time away. This was of course after experiencing powerful diarrhea from the Olestra in the chips, so they need something to do. If I had a nickel for every time this ad ran and every time I heard a different person say that it sucks, I'd probably have enough to afford a sensibly priced used foreign car. Whichever godless agency made those ads and sold themselves to the devil to have it played 500 times a day is going to get what they deserve someday. Not to mention all of the actors...ahem, I mean musicians in those ads.

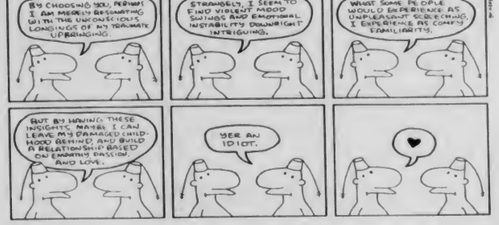
"Bob's Discount Furniture Ads" – Bob, you are killing all of us with your incessant invasion of our homes via the TV. You may need to sell furniture to make a living, but this hombre would not spend dime one in your store because I am sick of looking at it on TV. Hell, I don't even have to show up to buy something. There are so many damn ads on I have the layout memorized. "Go down aisle four and make a left at the dinette set. That's the ottoman I want!" I am actually waiting for the day that a Bob's ad shows up in a Bob's ad. When that happens a giant black hole will develop and swallow all of us.

"America Online Ads" – If there is anyone in the world who does not know what America Online is, they don't deserve to know by now. America Online is probably pumped into our heads while we sleep. I don't even know why they waste the time or the money making the ads. Honestly. People who don't even own computers have America Online and are just happy to sit there and stare at the shiny side of the CD, and they still pay 25 bucks a month. Endangered apes in the mountains have AOL and they all agree, "It's really easy to use...especially if you have opposable thumbs!"

"The 'Steve' Gateway Computer Ads" – First off, Steve gets beat up a lot at school. I wonder why Gateway stock has tanked lately? Everyone hates Steve and now everyone hates Gateway computers. If this kid came up to me in an electronics store and opened his mouth it would take the whole security staff to pry my hands off his weenie throat.



"Miss Cleo" – Miss "Crapo" is more like it. She's no more Jamaican than I am Eskimo and she is about as clairvoyant as a glass of orange juice. Most of these ads have the production value of a z-grade porn film and the acting is just about that good. I think Mistress Cleo and Bob the furniture guy need to combine forces or at least rent out a studio together. If you call Mistress Cleo that's your business, not that you'd admit that to anyone but please get off my television.



"Ads for Wood" – The God's honest truth is that there are actually ads for wood. You know the stuff trees are made of. Has there been a major change in the world or has wood suddenly fallen out of taste with people who are building, say, anything. Wood is the most often used material on the planet. Have people forgotten about wood? "Say honey, I was going to build a deck but I couldn't think of what to make it out of. I'll just use cardboard." Give me a break here. What's next, ads for milk? Oh wait...

All of these ads rile me up for one reason or another. Mostly because many of them completely blanket the airwaves and you can't escape them even though you desperately want to. Advertising milk and wood seem so ludicrous to me that it is almost a waste. So how do we change all of that? I for one, will run out to a sawmill and buy as much wood as Pufton will allow me to store inside my apartment. God forbid I wouldn't be able to bus any because the ad campaign failed and everyone is building houses from titanium. Secondly, I will buy 100 Gateway computers, find Steve's house and then have them all dropped from a helicopter through the roof. One's bound to find its mark.

The deafening sounds of silence:

Notes of tragedy still linger with us all

RACHEL BARTOLOMEI

Noise. You wake up to it, you deal with it all day and at times, you even fall asleep to it. The pounding bass next door pulses day in and day out. The people in the dorm across from you scream obscenities and have conversations with each other from ground level to the 7th floor. Inside, the television blares, the alarm clock rings and the teachers drone, while outside, the breeze rustles, buses rumble and planes fly overhead. Whatever happened to silence? I know this might seem like a foreign subject to many of you. I realize the absence of noise is a hard concept to grasp, living at UMass and all. But think about it for a second. When is the last time you can say that you were enveloped in silence? Before these past few weeks, I would have to say it had been a very long time. However, during this past week, it has been eerily silent in my life, on this campus, and in the United States in general.

When I stood in the shower stall last Tuesday, listening to my roommate tell me about the horrible tragedy that had just occurred, the first bout of silence came over me. I had no words for her, nor did I have anything to say in general. Instead, I came back to my room and sat on my bed in shock and disbelief. Everyone else seemed to have words for describing what had happened, or what was going to happen. Not me. I was numb.

The next incredible amount of silence I experienced was that same night at the vigil by the campus pond. Four thousand souls and not a sound could be heard. It was amazing. I never thought a group that size could quiet itself so easily. You could have heard a pin drop, but unfortunately all I heard dripping were tears.

Since then, the campus has slowly but surely been coming back to life. You know what the strange thing is, though? I'm still numb. I'm not sure if it hasn't sunk in yet, or if this is how I'm dealing with it. I have seen people crying, I have seen people personally affected by what has happened, and I have witnessed over and over the awful images on television and the Internet. So I wonder if there is something wrong with me. It doesn't feel right, somehow, to not feeling anything. I would rather feel anger, vengeance, sadness, empathy, sympathy, anything besides void and empty. I don't know anyone else that feels like this.

I have seen people that chant "REVENGE! We must get back at the people who did this to the United States!" However, anger is not the best way to deal with this situation. Many people have it, but you have to remember that anger is an emotion, and acting on emotions is not the way to go. Remember, I'm a girl. I have had firsthand experience with acting on raw emotion. To deal with something like this, emotions need to be put aside, and pure intellectual thought needs to replace them. If we all thought before we acted, this world would be a much more pleasant place to live in.

I have also seen people that are ready and willing to enlist in war, which is a brave and noble idea in theory, but in reality, are any of us ready for a war? Physically, maybe, but emotionally, no. Our generation has never had to face anything close to war. We've been sheltered in a tiny bubble with no cares or worries about the outside world. War is hell. Hate to break it to all of you "I'm-ready-to-enlist-to-fight-for-the-freedom-of-our-wonderful-country" boys, but war is not some glorious celebration. It is a gruesome reality that nobody should ever have to go through. I agree that it is a courageous act, and I certainly do not put anyone down who chooses to take that route.

Our country needs people with that frame of mind. However, I have seen people that are actually excited about going into war, wanting to engage in the killing. Fighting needs to be done, but it does not need to be looked forward to. It may be necessary, but it is not pleasant. All I can think about when I think of war is the opening scene from "Saving Private Ryan." That pretty much sums it up. I don't think any other words are needed to describe it.

Lastly, I have seen people that simply cannot go on from this tragedy. People who are not even personally affected by it are obsessed with every little detail the media has to offer. That's all they talk about, think about and want to be updated on. Yes, this is an awful tragedy, but to have any sense of sanity, one needs to move on rather than dwell on the situation. It's necessary to have a set schedule, to sleep and eat regularly, and to go to class. This doesn't mean we've forgotten what has happened, it just means that we're trying to live our lives in remembrance of those who no longer have that privilege.

> "I might have felt numbness and silence during this tragedy, but now that feeling has been replaced by immense fear."

The bottom line is that we, as thinking and feeling beings, need to be rational, yet sympathetic towards what happened last week in New York, Washington D.C. and Pennsylvania. We need to unite together by giving blood, comforting those people who have been directly affected by the tragedy in any way, and preparing for what's to come in the future. We need to be patriotic and show the rest of the world exactly what we're made of. I have never seen as many American flags in the past week than I have in my entire life. Flags are flying on the backs of cars, on backpacks, out of dorm windows, half-mast at many establishments. It makes me really proud to be part of America in this time of tragedy. I have never really had a sense of patriotism or felt like part of my country until this moment. It's too bad that it takes something of this magnitude to bring out the best in people. But in the end, it doesn't matter how this sense of pride and patriotism in the United States was brought about. The important thing is that it is here now, and it seems like it is here to stay for a long time.

At this moment, I feel like I belong in America. I really feel as if the people here are one in spirit and fighting for the same ideals. I think we could all agree that we believe in the principle of freedom and the right not to live in fear of cowardly terrorists such as these. For these terrorists were cowards. If they were brave, they would have found a way to compromise and be peaceful. Anyone that feels the need to follow the path of violence and aggression is not honorable, in my eyes. There are better ways to go about it.

I don't know about anyone else, but I'm scared to death about what the future is going to bring. I might have felt numbness and silence during this tragedy, but now that feeling has been replaced by immense fear. As the television spits out images of destruction, hate, and sadness, the distant reality of war gets closer. War seems pretty much inevitable at this point, and all we can do is sit back and watch. Silently.

Resurrected Megadeth takes the show on the road

By Rob Schulze

COURTESY SANCTUARY RECORDS

The reformed and more sensitive metal band, Megadeth understands the needs of their fans.

Megadeth: American spokesband.

"[Fans] almost look to us to be a musical spokesperson because of just the annihilation of the music and the political slant of our music," said bassist David Ellefson about the reactions of fans since the terrorist attacks on New York City and Washington, D.C. "At the shows, it's nice to see people go out and be entertained for even a couple of hours. I think [the shows] have been better. People, unprovoked by us, have been chanting "USA! USA!"

Ellefson acknowledges that this is not without its ironies, considering the band's history of leftist politics and anti-government stances. Megadeth is the band that has for years closed its shows with a cover of the Sex Pistols' "Anarchy in the UK."

"Years ago it was more from an anarchistic point of view, but now its almost like we're now rallying the troops," Ellefson said, but he isn't really surprised by the reactions they're now getting. "We've gotten a lot of support from the military personnel people from the Gulf War. They were playing Megadeth when they were over there, saying they had Megadeth blasting from their tanks... we were like 'no shit!' But it's good fighting music, and it seems like right now, that seems to be the attitude of this country.

"I'm proud to be touring right now. I'd like to see people rally support and unite," said Ellefson.

This tour is definitely an upswing for the band. Megadeth, regarded by many as one of the greatest and most innovative speed/thrash metal bands in history, had fallen from grace in recent years. After the high-water mark of 1997-98, when the band's Cryptic Writings album, a blend of old-school thrash and new experimental melodic metal, was wildly successful and the band headlined several tours across the world, including a co-headling jaunt on the Ozzfest with Tool and Ozzy, things seemed to fall apart for the band.

First drummer Nick Menza and then guitarist Marty Friedman left the band, being replaced by former Suicidal Tendencies drummer Jimmy Degrasso and former Savatage axeman Al Pitrelli. The band's two follow-ups to Cryptic Writings, Risk and a greatest-hits disk, were poorly received. Risk especially was soundly rejected by the band's hardcore following, with its alt-rock flavor and slow songs seen by many as not only a bad album, but also as a betrayal. The low point of the entire 20-year history of the band must have been the summer of 2000, as the once-proud thrash maniacs played to quarter-full amphitheaters while opening for (of all bands) Motley Crue.

No more. Their new album The World Needs A Hero is definitely metal, and the band is happy to be back to it.

"Heavy metal as we had known it was pretty much going away [in 1997]. We were really getting directed by management to reinvent ourselves... Cryptic Writings was probably a pretty good mix of metal like "Vortex" and "ffff," but also developing a new part of our sound which led to "Trust," "Almost Honest," things like that. I think that record was a very good balance of traditional Megadeth and Megadeth spreading its wings and trying to soar, if you will.

"Risk didn't pay enough attention to the traditional Megadeth... as I say that, as I listen to that record, I think there's some phenomenal songs on it... if it didn't say Megadeth on it, that album may have been multiple times platinum," said Ellefson.

The band does get defensive about Risk, but they know that they had done something that, as satisfying as it was to them, was poison to their fan base.

"We don't want to keep sounding like the same old versions of ourselves," Ellefson said about the band's sound differing from album to album. "Now that we did that [Risk], it felt good to go into the studios and make The World Needs A Hero."

"There seems to be a whole new resurgence of vibe, and just a cool, not only for Megadeth but for what we do and how we're doing it.

"It's like Nike's 'Just Do It,' you know? Just Be Megadeth!" said Ellefson, laughing.

The band is happy to be pleasing their fans again, and are expressing that in every way possible on this tour.

"What you see in Megadeth right now is the sight of the fans redirecting us," said Ellefson. "There's a very hands-on feel from night-to-night on this tour. We've invited everybody to go to our website at www.megadeth.com and vote for the songs we play that night."

That's correct – not a joke or a gimmick, Megadeth are really playing what the fans in that city want to hear, night in and night out. What this means is that, while such recent classics as "Trust," "Tout le Monde," and "Symphony of Destruction" are still in the set, more and more of the older material is reintroducing itself on the stage. Things like "The Conjuring" from Peace Sells...But Who's Buying and "Hook in Mouth" from So Far...So Good...So What! are being heard in the pits for the first time in years.

"It's funny how some of them just come back, just like auto-pilot.

There's somewhere we're like 'God, we were sick fuckers when we wrote that, man!'" said Ellefson with a laugh.

In addition to the new album and the headlining tour, Megadeth are also planning on releasing a long-form version of their recent "Behind the Music" episode on DVD sometime this fall.

"There was so much that we couldn't fit into it... I mean, Megadeth was an eighteen-year career at that point. It went from the Megadeth, the tragic times of the drugs and alcohol, to all of a sudden Jimmy and Al are in the band and things are great. We just decided to do it real justice to people who have their appetite whetted," said Ellefson.

And yes, everything you saw on "Behind the Music" was true. Especially the drugs.

"I grew up on a farm in Minnesota. I knew better all the time, but any time I dabbled with something and it felt great, it was like it was acceptable now," said Ellefson about his heroin problem which was so thoroughly explored on VH-1.

Killing Is My Business [Megadeth's debut album], 50 percent of the money spent on that went up our nose," the bassist said. "Once you become a drug addict, pretty much everything you do is designed to support your drug habit... any friend, anyone who is in your life is somehow an enabler to it, be it a drug dealer or a girlfriend or anything."

Not any more, though. The thrash legends of old are back, taking names, and thoroughly enjoying it.

"For Megadeth, we feel like we're just onstage for the first time. We say 'holy shit!' every night!"

Collective's bad music

Collective Soul
Seven Year Itch
Atlantic

COURTESY ATLANTIC RECORDS

Collective Soul cut their hair and tried their hardest to fit in with the popular kids.

"Now, at long last, comes 'Seven Year Itch, Collective Soul Greatest Hits 1994-2001,' the band's highly anticipated best-of collection."

Translation: career over.

The Goo Goo Dolls, Matchbox 20, Third Eye Blind, Train and Creed might rock (sort of), but no group from the mid-90's played harder "geared straight for radio success" songs than Collective Soul. All of them should be wary if their label suggests a greatest hits album. Knowing that rock greatness can only be sustained for so long, Atlantic Records is acknowledging that, with the release of a Seven Year Itch, Collective Soul is only a "Behind the Music" episode away from a totally destroyed career.

Whatever happened to greatest hits albums being released for bands that were great? One hit wonders – or in Collective Soul's case, four-hit wonders – get their own best of the best albums. According to the press we got on this band, Collective Soul had hits off of five albums. Five. That isn't a career; that's a recording company desperately trying to sustain a one-hit wonder. And it's painfully obvious listening to what is supposed to be the very best of Collective Soul.

Lead singer Ed Roland and the rest of his band never matured musically. Instead of diversifying and exploring the traditions surrounding their music, they continuously attempted to recapture the glory of "Shine," the band's one good song. Infectious and rocking, "Shine" was a simple rock song. It was never anything more. Of course, that's not good enough for the music industry, a body that has never shown the ability to leave a good thing alone. Instead, Atlantic clearly pressured Soul into more and more albums (five albums in seven years is production at quite a clip) in an attempt to get the magic back. Collective Soul's one shining success (get it?) led to the inevitable: strange sunglasses, new looks, attempts at artful albums, progressively blander music, and consequently, smaller success at each turn. According to the press we got, Dosage, the band's last album, featured a song that achieved "most-added" status in the Rock, Active Rock and Alternative outlets nationwide for one week. Why not just attempt to praise Roland for not running over pedestrians on his way to the Quickie Mart?

It's pointless talking about the actual songs on the album: after the triumph of "Shine" the songs blend together, both aurally and in a "hey, this is that one song" sort of way. Unfortunately, that's how Collective Soul will go down in history: known as nothing more than composers of "that one song."

And what few songs that do stand out on the Seven Year Itch stand out because of their similarity to other singles. "The World I Know" could literally be the Goo Goo Dolls' "Iris." There is no discernable difference between the songs. The two new songs on the album aren't any better. Wedged between singles that any casual listener might recognize, "Energy" and the "Next Homecoming" are clearly base singles, designed to be nothing more than more catchy filler. The fact that they are hidden amongst familiar tracks seems to indicate a lack of faith from Atlantic. The only thing worse than the total lack of creative drive on the album is the title itself: Seven Year Itch? Was that the very best the band could come up with?

No band can sustain itself if it seeks only to recapture its former magic. Collective Soul is a case study in pointlessness. The band's entire existence was dedicated to recording another "Shine" and it never happened. Releasing a greatest hits album isn't going to change that.

Shakespeare meets hip-hop

By Martha Oliva
Collegian Correspondent

Out of the smoke that billowed from the Fine Arts Center stage Thursday night rose Rodney Mason as Rome, the passionate and versatile lead in Rennie Harris' hip-hop opera Rome and Jewels. Mason, a compact man in tank top and rippled muscles, commanded the audience's attention as a criminal does his pursuer: with energy, acute perception, and an inkling of what is to come.

Rome and Jewels, inspired by Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, and the musical West Side Story, is a dance/theater work that incorporates dj-ing and videography into a loud and sensual production. Rennie Harris' troupe is packed with buff bodies and stellar talents who perform hip-hop, break-dance and acrobatics with equal and astounding aptitude. Harris' dancers, like those of his great contemporaries such as Mark Morris, perform with precision, but without boring uniformity, each and every movement is just so, but each dancer's manner makes the moves his own.

Harris's company and work are not without their faults, the most glaring of which is a striking shortage of women. Harris does employ two women, but they are just two of the boys, skilled but nameless dancers in the Caps gang. Neither of those two women fills the role of Jewels. Jewels, instead, is an invisible presence in the work that bears her name, a non-existent antagonist for whom Tibault and Rome kill and are killed. Jewels is most prominently absent from a scene in which she and Rome consummate their relationship. Rome gyrates by himself, center stage, making love to the spotlight, as if to say that there is no room for women in Harris' boys' club. What an interesting choice to eliminate one half of a work's title characters. And how conspicuous that it is the female half. The elimination of women is a pathetic anachronism in what is otherwise a thoroughly modern affair.

The production is narrated by Ollie Jones, whose character has recently been released from prison and is trying to live a straight life. He is friendly with Rome and Tibault and both characters, upon seeing him clad in head-to-toe white, refer to him as the Grand Imperial Wizard. The role is an important one that ties the work together and allows for atmospheric foreshadowing. Jones has a long, fluid body, and acute skill at popping and locking, a hip-hop dance style in which the body goes slack, then flings back into position. He is, however, a somewhat awkward stage presence, which is particularly unfortunate in a character who is supposed to be a tough former prison inmate as well as the audience's confident guide.

The performance included many interludes of talent showcasing. Certainly, Rennie Harris' gifted company possesses more than enough flair to justify such indulgence and, at times, such as the rumble of the Monster Q's and the Caps, the showcasing is appropriate and enhancing. At other times, however, it seems self-indulgent and unsophisticated. It is as if the performers haven't been given enough compelling material pertinent to the story's progression to fill the designated space so they resort to old tricks, like a flailing comic forced to deliver knock knock jokes.

The most glaring example of this digression came post-rumble as Rodney Mason broke character to address the audience. He stood alone on the stage and began a soliloquy as Shakespeare would have had done, but paused a few seconds into his speech to scold the audience for their lack of enthusiasm, a jarring discontinuity (not to mention an undeserved reprimand). The next few minutes were a one-man show in which Mason delivered social commentary in mile a minute rhyme. An extremely talented dancer, Mason used his body the way Robin Williams is wont to use his voice: contorting, convulsing and transitioning through personas at warp speed. While this aside was engrossing, it distracted from the story at hand, thus lessening the work's power and sophistication.

Another instance of showcasing had the desired effect of pumping up the audience and building the power of the work. Just prior to the hip-hop opera's last tragic scenes, the stage was emptied of dancers and left in the hands of three extremely skilled disc jockeys: Mr. Cisum, DJ Miz, and DJ Evil Tracy. The three men traded off solos and collaborations for a few intoxicating minutes of rhythm that held the audience — and me — rapt.

Danced with unparalleled hip-hop skill and athleticism, and scored with style, Rennie Harris' Rome and Jewels makes for a visually and audibly stimulating evening. The work's emotional power is also remarkable, but not what it perhaps could be if Harris were to eliminate the moments of self-indulgent distraction, and trust the abilities of women enough to allow them into his work.

Rushdie predicts the future in Fury

By James R. Calhoun
The Peak (Simon Fraser U.)

(U-WIRE) BURNABY, British Columbia – I was up at quarter to four on Tuesday, Sept. 11. I made coffee and turned on the television to CNN as per my usual morning routine and started making my way through Salman Rushdie's latest novel, Fury. I had promised a review to the editor for the following day, and so, muted the news and got down to taking notes. I read steadily for about an hour and a half. At one point in the novel, the protagonist Malik Solanka is set to meet Neela, a woman so beautiful that men catching a glimpse of her will walk into street signs and react in other, Chaplin-esque ways. The conversation is strained as they sit on a park bench in Manhattan: Neela has just gotten rid of her lover, Jack, one of Solanka's very few friends, and they are both very concerned about Jack's recent behaviour.

This is what I read: "All around them in the park the colors were fading. The world became a place of blacks and grays. Women's clothes – unusually for New York, it had been a season of bright colors – faded to monochrome. Under a gunmetal sky, the green leached out of the spreading trees." And then I looked up at the muted television screen as the news of the American attack broke.

Rushdie's latest novel is a wonderful read, and I have been recommending it to everyone. It is a slimmer volume than some of his previous work, which makes for a tighter and more humourous tale – you will even laugh out loud in places, (the serious discussion on the difference between the English and American attitude to a blow job comes to mind). Also, at 259 pages, Fury is a far less intimidating place to acquaint oneself with Rushdie than his other novel, The Ground Beneath Her Feet, which run to nearly 600 pages.

However, in light of last Tuesday, I suggest that if there is one book you read in the next few weeks, it should be Fury. Rushdie has captured something, a mood (for lack of a better term), that permeates New York as the Furies descend on the city and Malik Solanka – what better place, Malik considers at one point, for the Furies to descend? And we see their descent, not only on Malik, but also in one instance on a Muslim cab driver, who spews racial hatred at the traffic of New York, in a scene that can prove more damning to Islam than anything within The Satanic Verses. I won't quote it, because I don't think The Peak will print it.

The first two pages of chapter six are so potentially inflammatory at a time like this that I fear Rushdie will be both quoted out of context and used to justify "revenge" against Muslims, for there are as emotionally charged people who want someone to point the finger at, consumed by the Furies themselves and lashing out at innocents, as we have seen happening over the past few days. Remember when you read it, that this scene is about a man possessed, not knowing what he was doing, presented to mirror the predicament of Malik when he behaves in a similar manner – remember that, please, so that you can refute anyone who misquotes it.

There are other passages that read like a prophecy in light of the WTC attacks– not in specifying any of the events, but rather, the mood and character of New York. There are places when you cannot help but put your finger down on the page and mutter assent. Rushdie's cast of characters allow him to look at America through so many different sets of eyes – the German-Jew plumber, the black journalist turned high-society gossip, the techno-teenage internet genius, and of course through Malik Solanka. He is the Indian born, Cambridge-educated professor turned millionaire, inventor of the cyber-doll "Little Brain" who takes the world by storm like Harry Potter. Thus, Fury is a brilliant, tight little novel that is shockingly contemporary, and one that should be read soon. The dust jacket blurb states: "one of our greatest writers captures a time and place with humour and uncanny insight"– the description couldn't be more concise.

did a great job of not coming out like we did over there."

Deren has been on a roll the past couple of games and he continued his offensive explosion versus Maine. Before halftime, the Chicopee, Mass. native scored two goals – his fourth and fifth of the season – about ten minutes apart from each other, giving UMass a 4-0 lead at the break.

In the second half, UMass was just as successful as they were in the previous one.

Ten minutes into the half, junior Yuri Morales strategically tapped a ball pass the outreached arms of the goalkeeper and extended the score to 5-0.

In the 60th minute, Myers netted his second goal of the match – making the score 6-0.

Realizing the game was out of reach for the Black Bears, coach Koch gave his bench players a chance to show their skills to the UMass crowd.

The subs did not disappoint. They were able to sustain the pressure left by the starters.

Freshman Gabe Barnard executed a perfect corner kick when junior Jason Golesky fired a pass from the right corner to the flying Barnard who headed the ball through the net. The beautifully performed goal gave the Maroon and White a 7-0 lead en route to its third victory in a row.

"They all did a great job today," Koch said. "I am very pleased with what they have done."

Maine only had 4 shots on goal for the day, thanks in part to the stifling UMass defense.

"The defense starts with our front runners, having to put pressure on their backs," Koch said. "Our mid-fielders have picked it up and our back has been real good."

Junior John Lytton has picked up his play of late and it was apparent in Saturday's match when he got an assist on Myers' second goal. His defense has kept the pressure off of senior goalkeeper Bryan O'Quinn.

"John [Lytton] has really solidified the back now," Koch remarked.

However, the skipper knows that his squad still has some things to work on before its Atlantic 10 schedule starts.

"It certainly helps that we have been playing well," he said. "Bottom line though is we are 0-0 going into the game.

"We need to limit our touches a little more," Koch added. "We are playing some balls in the back that are not real good ones."

UMass gets a full week to prepare for its first A-10 opponent, Rhode Island. The match is slated for 1 p.m. at Totman Field. If the team can make the necessary adjustments by game time on Saturday, the forecast will be looking good for the Minutemen.

the Rams's defense back right from the get go, bending it back and waiting for it to break. Just six minutes into the game, Lilly dropped a pass inside to freshman Stephanie Santos. No. 17 quickly lobbed the ball over the middle to junior Martha Conover, who, with a header, beat the URI keeper Jamie Epperlein and put UMass in the lead.

Led by Lilly and all-conference player Brooke Bartlett, the UMass offense continued to cause headaches for the URI defense throughout the first half.

"Those two worried the hell out of them," Rudy said. "Whatever they finished up with statistically is immaterial. They kept that team so busy that it opened everyone else up. That's why they are great players."

Lilly chalked up another assist at 17:32, taking a Katelyn Jones pass and dropping the ball right in front of the net to a wide-open Michelle Luttati. The Westford, Mass. native drilled the ball into the back of the net for her first collegiate goal and a 2-0 UMass lead.

"Erin Lilly worked her ass off today," URI coach Geoff Bennett said during the second half.

The Rams finally posed a true threat minutes later when senior forward Shannon Kittelson broke free to the goal. UMass Goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky came way off her line, cutting Kittelson off. Podhrasky knocked the ball away, taking both Kittelson and herself down to the ground. Some holding and pushing went on soon after, with a yellow card eventually issued to Kittelson at 31:04, one that Podhrasky admitted to instigating.

"I wouldn't let her get up," Podhrasky said. "But she was on top, so it looked like she was pushing me. She was really just trying to get up. I hooked her with my arm. I was just looking at the ball and holding her down."

With her keeper on the ground, junior defender Alexi Rudd preserved the shutout with a terrific diving save on a shot by URI's Catherine Zanni.

The Minutewomen extended their lead to 3-0 on a Katelyn Jones header from Santos and Luttatti.

URI missed another golden opportunity before half on a miscommunication by Rudd and Podhrasky that left the net open, but Ram Sarah Johnston missed the shot, giving Podhrasky enough time to recover and smother the ball.

Bennett had his Rams squad pumped up for the second half. With the Minutewomen feeling the injuries they suffered from the previous week, URI kept the ball in its offensive third for the first seven minutes of the second half. The seemingly winded UMass squad struggled to keep the shutout intact.

"Martha Conover sprained her ankle midweek," Rudy said. "Jones hurt her shoulder midweek. Brooke Bartlett hurt her ankle last weekend. So Kat [Machamer] had to work much harder and our other center, Michelle Luttati had to work so much harder.

"When we attacked aggressively," Rudy added, "that was a lot of running, and that sort of ran us out. By the time I tried to repair it, they had begun to grab hold of the game, and this is a game of ebbs and flows. And you certainly saw that today."

After a few near misses on corner kicks and on an indirect kick, URI junior Heather Kasparek sent a pass across the face of the goal to sophomore Dana Mantella, who drilled a shot over Podhrasky's right shoulder into the net, closing the gap to 3-1.

Sensing his players' fatigue, Rudy sent three freshmen substitutions onto the field in a four-minute period. Playing four freshmen with the game on the line, Rudy would admit later, was a combination of needing fresh bodies and a developing trust in his younger players' abilities. Rudy managed to keep the younger players evenly distributed throughout the field, keeping veterans mixed in with his greener talent.

"These kids need to learn how to run out a game," Rudy said. "[But] we didn't disrupt a whole area at once."

More missed opportunities plagued the Rams for the remainder of the game, which ended at 3-1. URI actually managed more shots, 14-10, than the UMass squad, but couldn't capitalize on its opportunities.

The Minutewomen were pleased to begin their A-10 schedule with a victory, seeing it as another integral beginning section in a long season.

"Today was another start for us," Lilly said. "We got [over the] UConn loss when we won [last Sunday over Binghamton] and today is a whole other thing, [starting] A-10's."

The bumbling antics of UMass football

By Matthew F. Sacco
Collegian Staff

NEWARK, Del. – Mental miscues were the order of the day for the Massachusetts football team, as the Minutemen were served a 35-7 pasting at the hands of Delaware.

The supposed marquee match up of Saturday's Atlantic-10 Conference slate was marred by the bumbling UMass offense. Coach Mark Whipple's attack looked like a Three Stooges marathon with four lost fumbles, two interceptions and nine penalties for 81 yards.

"I am disappointed in the way the offense just turned the ball over and put the defense in a tough situation," Whipple said. "We handed the game to them – flat handed the game to them."

The bulk of the blunders fell on the inexperienced shoulders of redshirt freshman Matt Guice. Guice (3 fumbles, 2 INT) dangled brilliance in the view of his coach against Division I-A Marshall but exhibited only immaturity against the rival Hens.

"If we have a quarterback who plays like that we won't win a game," Whipple said.

The young signal caller however, was not a loner in the gaffe-filled affair. His teammates continually assisted the Hens cause with unintelligent penalties and mental lapses.

"We get two roughing the passers [penalties]," Whipple said. "We want our guys to be aggressive but we don't want them to take any unnecessary penalties."

As much as turnovers can slay optimism, inopportune penalties were perhaps the nail in the Maroon and White coffin – especially on defense and special teams. In a couple acts of tomfoolery, Whipple's return unit gave the Minutemen seemingly favorable field position. Unfortunately, those gains were instantly nullified by two ill-advised holding penalties.

"That really got us out of sync. We have a couple good returns and then all of a sudden you go backwards," Whipple said. "That is the first time I remember holding on a kickoff return in a long time."

Special teams woes aside, UMass played with a burning desire to help the other team move the ball down the field. Near the end of the second quarter, a would-be fourth down and 11 for the Hens was instead a first and goal after an obtuse roughing the passer penalty on the Minutemen. Instead of a Delaware field goal, the result was a Blue Hen touchdown.

Despite a mistake-filled first half, the Maroon and White remained positive, as the deficit was but two touchdowns – that is, until the start of the third quarter.

"It really came down to the second half when we turn the ball over and make it 28-7," Whipple said. "Guice fumbles again and [Darrell] Edmonds runs it in, that just took the wind out of our sails."

Five turnovers in the first half, and one huge fumble returned for a touchdown in the second, simply smashed any victorious expectations.

Through three games, the 2001 UMass football squad has been college football's version of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. If they showed anything, the Minutemen showed promise against the Thundering Herd in Huntington, W.V.

"It's befuddling when Marshall's faster, bigger, stronger and you don't do those things – then it happens [against Delaware]," Whipple said.

But against Delaware they showed just how juvenile they can be with a multitude of rookie slip-ups. In a game teeming with gridiron faux pas, the UMass football team displayed the ugly face of youth and inexperience.

Two minutes after McKenzie's interception return in the opening quarter, the Blue Hen offense struck for the first time with a 59-yard Postlethwait bomb to Brett Veach on a deep right-to-left slant.

Face with third-and-13 on the ensuing drive, Guice, forced to scramble, fumbled after a hit by right linebacker Dan Mulhern. Two plays later, Delaware took a 14-7 lead on a 15-yard toss from Postlethwait to Jamin Elliot.

Antawn Jenkins (18 carries, 108 yards) scored the Hens' next touchdown, just over two minutes into the second quarter. First-and-goal from the six-yard line, Jenkins took a feed from Postlethwait and motored toward paydirt. Losing the ball in the process, Jenkins recovered his own fumble in the endzone for the 21-7 advantage.

Thanks to a bad snap on UMass' prior punt attempt, Delaware began that drive on the Minutemen's 12-yard line, and needed only three plays to notch the quick seven. It was in situations like that short-field encounter the UMass defense was unable to stop the Hens. The Minuteman watch held its own in long-field situations - highlighted by Jeremy Robinson's two interceptions (with a hard cast on his right hand) – but was forced into too many adverse circumstances.

"We just never gave our defense a chance to gain some confidence," Whipple said.

Deshon Hardy was the only bright spot on offense for UMass. The senior caught 10 passes for 135 yards.

Kent State's sports calender discovered to be quite revealing

By Dustin Dow
Daily Kent Stater (Kent State U.)

(U-WIRE) KENT, Ohio – The Kent State athletic marketing department is scrambling to remove fall sports calendars that contain a photograph revealing an Eastern Michigan soccer player's vaginal region.

The photograph, which measures two inches by three inches and is centered at the top of the poster, shows Kent State defender Kristin Meister battling an Eastern Michigan player for the ball. The Eastern Michigan player's shorts are hiked up at an angle that show her genitalia in the photograph.

"We missed it," athletic director Laing Kennedy said. "I didn't know about it until last Thursday, and once it was brought to my attention, I made the decision to pull the posters off the shelves and take them down wherever we had distributed them."

Posters that were displayed across campus have been taken down and will be replaced by new posters that will be reprinted within two weeks. The cost of reprinting is $1,200 and will come out of the athletic department's marketing budget. The posters contained three commercial ads from Huntington Banks, Ramada Inn of Kent and Rockne's restaurant. The advertisers will be credited the ads they bought.

Ramada Inn manager Dwight Leasters said the photograph should not hurt the hotel's relationship with the university.

"This isn't a situation we're going to take advantage of," he said. "We've always had a good relationship with the athletic department."

Sports information director Will Roleson said the error was found when an unidentified person calling from a dorm notified the athletic department of the photograph.

"It is what it is," Roleson said of the photograph. "We certainly don't want that poster to be representative of the athletic department. It's blatant, but by no means was it done on purpose."

Kennedy said the poster was seen by several members of the athletic department staff before it was printed.

"Should we have caught it? Yes, no question," Kennedy said. "Ultimately I have to take responsibility, and I do. It should have been caught three or four times. I sure didn't catch it, and I approved the poster."

scored at the 29:43 mark for Michigan, but UMass kept the Wolverines off the board again until Adrienne Hortillosa drove home a score 17 minutes later.

From that point on the floodgates opened, as Michigan would score another goal in the first half and three more in the second frame to secure the win.

"You can make excuses all you want, but we just weren't playing our game," Egland said. "For the first 15 minutes we played great, but then we kind of fell apart."

"We failed to run for each other," Gilbert added. "When one person stops running it is a domino effect and everyone's play lets down. And Michigan never let up the whole game."

Egland had an especially tough outing dealing with a shot every two minutes. However, she was able to hold her own, making 12 saves despite the fact that six shots made their way into the back of the cage.

"It is difficult to not get down on yourself when that many goals go in," Egland said. "But you just have to take the good parts of the game and move on."

LIBRA (Sept. 24-Oct. 22) – Happy Birthday to Rob Schulze!!! SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – You can make even bad news work for you today. Don't focus on the things you cannot control; concentrate on those things you can manipulate. Like your roommate's underage girlfriend. Enjoy! SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – You can prove your own reliability once again today, thanks to a series of unexpected circumstances that allow you to take center stage. Most people never get to masturbate in front of a packed Mullins Center. CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You must be more accountable in the coming weeks, but today you may still be able to look at things in a jovial, lighthearted manner. Remember when your friends put your underwear in the freezer at your first sleepover party, get over it! AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Go to Bub's BBQ this weekend! It's all-you-can-eat, all-you-can-vomit and the butta is in an igloo cooker. Be sure to drop some of your Rolling Rock pitcher for your fallen homies. PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Heeeeeeyyyy you guys! The map you found in your best friend's attic only leads to Mama Fratelli. She's scary. ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Those around you are likely to be impressed with the new and improved you – or so it seems to be. Win them over by teaching them Skipbo. People love that game. TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – DJ Skribble – not as ugly as you thought. GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – What you do in and around the home today will be far more valuable to you in the long run than any possible professional accomplishment. Just stay on your couch in your skanky bathrobe and drink your orange Tang while watching Jenny Jones. CANCER (June 21-July 22) – No matter what you do, never ever sing "Waltzing Matilda," even if you are drunk. LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Take the time to size up a competitor with care today; you don't want to underestimate anyone and find yourself in over your head. VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Things that are refused you today may not be worth having at all in the long run. Don't let yourself become frustrated by restrictions at this time. Watch Reservoir Dogs and just be happy your name isn't Mr. Pink.

INSIDE: The bumbling antics of UMass football

Like last year's Delaware game at McGuirk Stadium (above), the Minutemen had trouble holding onto the football.

Hens house Minutemen

NEWARK, Del. – David Sanger, the punter for the Massachusetts football team, doubles as an actor. He staged his most recent work Saturday night inside Delaware Stadium.

Early in the fourth quarter of his team's Atlantic 10 bout with Delaware, the junior, struck by a Blue Hen after his punt, fell to the turf clutching his kicking foot. At once, coaches and trainers from the UMass sideline raced in aid to their fallen fourth-down specialist. The crowd fell silent.

Delaware	35
UMass	7

Got 'em.

Once encircled by his elders – including Head Coach Mark Whipple – for about a minute, Sanger hopped up effortlessly and ran off the field.

The Delaware supporters didn't find Sanger's bit of comedy to be too playful. His arms in the air, the punter was jeered by the Blue Hen faithful until his No. 33 faded into the Minuteman sideline.

Acting in bad taste isn't appreciated in most athletic contests. Sport doesn't embrace it.

But that doesn't hold true for bad acting. When a team fails in performance, its opponent surely exits without protest – as did Delaware Saturday evening after its 35-7 romp of UMass.

The Minutemen got off to a good start and led 7-0 with 5:41 left in the first quarter after senior Anton McKenzie picked off Hen quarterback Sain Postlethwait (7-for-20, 169 yards, 2 INT) and brought it back 29-yards for the score. But that would prove to be UMass' only tally of the game.

Haunted by six turnovers and nine penalties, the Minutemen (0-3, 0-1 A-10) were unable to create any sort of rhythm on the offensive side of the football and failed to score, compiling just 282 yards (182 passing, 100 rushing) for the contest. To that, Delaware (1-2, 1-1) wracked up 445 yards (169 passing, 276 rushing).

"I'm really at a loss," Whipple said. "If I saw these [mistakes] in practice, then we could correct them. But they're only happening in games and that is what's really befuddling.

"We just have to play more, I guess. I'm not sure why they do the things that they do on Saturday when they don't do it on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday."

Down 21-7 at the start of the second half, UMass took possession and pushed to its own 40 yard-line. But on third down, Blue Hen Femi Ayi – brother of former UMass linebacker Kole – knocked the ball away from redshirt freshman quarterback Matt Guice (20-for-32, 182 yards, 2 INT, 3 fumbles) and into the hands of teammate Darrel Edmonds, who scampered 37 yards to give Delaware the 28-7 lead.

That score froze the already cold Minuteman psyche.

"We didn't feel that bad [going into the half]," Whipple said. "But then we just gave them game right off the bat when Guice fumbled again. That kind of just took the wind out of our sails."

Men's soccer drills Black Bears

Saturday's weather forecast in the town of Amherst called for a cloudy day, however nobody could have forecast the kind of the day that the Massachusetts men's soccer team would put together against the Maine Black Bears.

A tale of two teams going in opposite directions was told at Totman Field Saturday, as the Minutemen trampled over Maine 7-0.

UMass	7

The blowout victory improved the Maroon and White's record to 4-2, while the Black Bears dropped to 1-3 on the season.

Following a moment of silence and an emotional "Star-Spangled Banner" for the victims in the Sept. 11 attacks, the Minutemen took the field and immediately took control of the match.

Juniors Derek Rhodes and Jeff Deren started the barrage of scoring in the 12th minute. The two played a little give-and-go on the right side of the box leading to a speeding shot from Rhodes past Maine goalkeeper Mat Cosgrif.

Only four minutes later, sophomore Ptah Myers dribbled around two Maine defenders on the right side and scored the second goal for UMass.

"We talked about not coming out too sluggish, like we did at New Hampshire," Head Coach Sam Koch said. "I think they

Minutewomen take Rhode to redemption

Revenge...nothing is sweeter.

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team was 12-1 overall against the University of Rhode Island heading into Sunday's match, with the only loss coming last year in a 3-0 disappointment at Kingston, RI.

It may seem like the loss happened a long time ago, but Coach Jim Rudy and his players, coming off a three game winning streak, have long memories and refused to allow another letdown to their conference rivals.

"We had good focus today," sophomore forward Erin Lilly said. "We lost to them last year and we couldn't have that today."

In its first conference game of the season No. 21 UMass [3-1, 1-0 Atlantic 10] defeated URI [3-2, 0-1 A-10] by a 3-1 margin at Totman Field on Sunday. The physical match up included two yellow cards and a plethora of uncalled penalties by both squads.

Long ride to weekend split

By Jesse Greenspan

It was quite a road trip.

The Massachusetts field hockey team ended its 17-day drought without playing a game by traveling all the way to Ann Arbor, Mich. (14 hours by bus), in order to take on No. 4 Michigan on Friday and Indiana on Saturday.

When the weekend's festivities had been settled, UMass [2-3, 0-0 Atlantic 10] got back on the bus with a win and a loss under its belt, dropping a 6-0 decision to the fourth ranked team in the land, before coming back with a convincing 4-1 victory over the Hoosiers.

UMass	4
Indiana	1
Michigan	6

"It was a pretty successful weekend," goaltender Ashley Egland said. The sophomore faced an onslaught against Michigan (making 12 saves) before taking it relatively easy against Indiana (no saves and no shots in first half). "Obviously, the first game was very difficult, but I thought we rebounded well."

Both games pitted outmatched teams against a superior foe and the Minutewomen got to see both sides of the spectrum. Against the Wolverines they got out shot 31-4 and were outplayed in basically all aspects of the game.

The tables turned against Indiana [0-5], however, as the Maroon and White dominated its opponents 27-6, won the penalty corner battle 20-5, and generally outclassed the competition.

"We might have played harder against Michigan but we kept it simple [against Indiana]," Ashley Gilbert said. The freshman notched her first collegiate goal to give her team the 1-0 lead over the Hoosiers with 24:30 remaining in the first half.

Two minutes after Gilbert's score, senior back Anke Bruemmer stepped up on the penalty corner and blasted one by the stunned Indiana goalie. Unfortunately for the Hoosiers, UMass' leading scorer (six goals) was far from done.

At the 17:48 mark, she converted on another penalty corner, bringing the Minutewomen into the locker room with a 3-0 lead. Stacey Blue and Kaitlyn Byron assisted on the first Bruemmer tally, while Lindsay Abbott and Adrianne Monaco assisted on the second Bruemmer score.

So far this season, coach Patty Shea has continued to switch around the positioning of her players on the penalty corner (with the exception of Bruemmer), in an attempt to find the stability that was there last year with newly graduated midfielders, Patty Robinson and Lucy Koch.

In the second half, Kimberly Nash poked home the Hoosier's lone goal before Bruemmer put the icing on the cake by tallying an unassisted score with four minutes remaining.

Against the Wolverines [5-2], the Maroon and White got off to a fairly good start, playing the competition close for the majority of the first half. Kristi Gannon

Provost announces new administration appointments and interim vice chancellor

By Joanna Zeifiin
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst announced two administration appointments and one position extension.

Interim Provost Charlena Seymour, in a released statement, named John Mullin interim Vice Chancellor of University Outreach and Leon Osterweil to the interim Dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics. The current interim Vice Chancellor for Research, Frederick W. Byron's appointment was extended.

"I am pleased that these extraordinary individuals will serve in these key leadership roles," said Seymour. "I am confident they will continue to promote and support academic excellence at the University, and I look forward to working closely with them during my tenure as provost."

John Mullin, a professor of landscape architecture and regional planning and director of the Center for Economic Development, has been a member of the University faculty since 1978.

He has written over 50 articles on industrial planning and downtown revitalization, earning him the UMass President's Medal for Public Service and the Distinguished Outreach Award from the Amherst campus.

"I am both honored and excited by this opportunity to lead University Outreach," Mullin said in a released statement. "It will be a great challenge, but one that I am eager to accept."

Leon Osterweil, a professor of computer science, has been on the UMass faculty since 1993. He was previously chair of the information and computer science department at the University of California – Irvine.

"Two key challenges are attracting the best and the brightest new faculty and sustaining the old faculty," Osterweil explained. "I am delighted to have this chance to lead the College's outstanding faculty as it continues its highly successful pursuit of a dazzling array of exciting opportunities in science."

Osterweil succeeds Robert Hallock, who retired in September.

Frederick W. Byron Jr. has been asked to continue his position as the interim Vice Chancellor for Research. Byron, interim Vice Chancellor since 1994, led the construction of the Large Millimeter Telescope, the world's largest radio telescope, a joint project between the University and the government of Mexico.

A member of the physics faculty since 1966, Byron was dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics from 1979-93. He received the Chancellor's Medal in 1993. The Chancellor's Medal is the campus's highest award for public service.

These new appointments, Seymour explained, will reveal the flexibility of the University's faculty.

"This will demonstrate that we have world class faculty who will assume administrative positions and other civic responsibilities when called upon," Seymour said. "There is no doubt in my mind that these are the best people in these important leadership roles."

While Seymour is confident in the abilities of the appointees, there will be more obstacles in the future.

"The challenges for the new appointees will be to get more faculty, better class room facilities and more funding to support the students," Seymour said. "If very talented people want to work here, it says a lot about this campus community and a lot about the students."

Aircraft scare causes shutdown of Quabbin

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

Ripples of fear from the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks swept closer to the University of Massachusetts this weekend when suspicious aircraft activity prompted State Police to seal off the nearby Quabbin Reservoir.

The 64 billion-gallon body of water and over 55,000 acres of land were closed to the public after two airplanes reportedly buzzed the reservoir at altitudes well below the 500 feet required by law.

The first plane, a white fixed-wing type, made two passes over the Quabbin's visitor's center and dam area at approximately 12:31 Saturday afternoon. The second aircraft, a red-and-white seaplane, made a third pass approximately three hours later.

Both planes were reportedly flying within 100 feet of the reservoir's surface.

"The manner in which these planes were flying was most definitely illegal," said Lt. Paul Maloney, a state policeman who works out of the Framingham barracks. "We are actively investigating where they came from and who was flying them."

Within hours of the incidents, local television stations reported that witnesses had seen a white object drop from one of the planes into the reservoir, which serves as a public water supply. Police and investigators from the Massachusetts Water Resource Agency (MWRA) reportedly searched the area and have dismissed the possibility of such an incident.

"My understanding is that there was no object dropped from either plane," said Maloney. "Nothing I have seen indicates that to be true."

The aircraft reportedly disappeared before witnesses could identify any numbering on them. There have been reports of military aircraft in the area shortly after the incidents, most notably The Springfield Union News quoting a Chicopee resident as saying he witnessed F-14 fighter jets "streaking over Quabbin."

Officials at Westover Metropolitan Airbase in Chicopee would neither confirm nor deny that any military aircraft were summoned to the area.

Police have blocked all traffic routes into the area, and the remainder of the fishing season on the reservoir (which usually extends to Oct. 20) has been cancelled. The area has long been an attraction for hikers, bicyclists and photographers, some of whom expressed concern about the sudden police presence there.

"The Quabbin is usually a beautiful, serene place where you can take out a canoe or have a picnic," said Ryan O'Mara, a senior double major in Linguistics and Philosophy at UMass. "Now it's surrounded by police armed with semi-automatic weapons. I think that's pretty messed up."

There has been no timetable set for reopening of the area, but Maloney said that officials from the MWRA could announce a decision as early as today. Indications are that even after land access is granted into the Quabbin, its airspace may remain restricted indefinitely.

"As of right now, the entire reservation is closed," Maloney said. "Rumors that it will reopen Wednesday are just that, rumors, and nothing will be done until the MWRA concludes its investigation."

For now, residents and environmentalists alike are left to ponder just how devastating a chemical attack on the Quabbin would be.

"Something like that would have an affect not only on the environment but on thousands of people," said Matthew Bolus, a senior Wildlife Conservation major and member of MASSPIRG. "That water doesn't just stay in the Quabbin; it goes underground into watersheds all across the area.

"This state already has the second-worst water quality in the country. To then pollute our drinking water would be nothing short of devastating."

The Quabbin Reservoir was shut down over fears of an eco-terrorist attack.

Hillel House co-sponsors food charity event with UMass

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts can donate food to the hungry simply by avoiding the Dining Commons on the evening of Tuesday, September 25.

Tzedek, a Jewish student group affiliated with Hillel House, has persuaded UMass Dining Services to make a contribution to charity for each student that willingly forgues dinner at the dining halls.

According to Dianne Sutherland, a Dining Services dietician, Dining Services will approximate the cost of the meals not served. This money will be given to two charities – Oxfam and Mazone – that specialize in feeding the hungry. All money donated will be taken directly from funds from campus meal plans.

Students interested in participating should contact Hillel House by Tuesday, September 25, and register to donate a meal. Students on the Your Campus Meal Plan [often referred to as the Off-Campus Meal Plan] can then go to Hillel House, and swipe their Dining Services card. Students on the Resident Meal Plan, once registered, need only decline to eat dinner at the Dining Commons. Funds collected from meals donated by Resident Meal Plan students will go to Oxfam, while funds collected from meals donated by Your Campus Meal Plan students will go to Mazone.

According to Rachel White, a Tzedek Chair, and one of the charity drive's organizers, the event was originally planned to coincide with Yom Kippur, the Jewish Day of Atonement. However, some Jewish students decided that they wanted to break their day-long fast with an on-campus meal at Hillel, so the event was scheduled for earlier in the week.

Tzedek is a student-run, nationwide Hillel group.

"We do a lot of advocacy and community service," says White. As examples, she cites a charity dance-a-thon held last year, and a current project in which students are baking apple pies to be donated to the Amherst Survival Center.

This is the second year that Tzedek has organized a donate-a-meal program. The Dining Services Office annually holds a similar program in November.

All students, regardless of faith, are encouraged by Tzedek to participate in the food drive. Mazone, while a Jewish organization, supplies food to people of all religions. Oxfam, the other charity being provided to, is non-secular. Interested students can contact Hillel House at 549-1710.

Distinguished lecture series announced

The University of Massachusetts has announced its 2001-2002 Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series. All lectures are free and open to the public in Memorial hall at 4:00p.m. A reception follows each talk.

All faculty members that participate in the series receive a Chancellor's Medal following their lecture. The Chancellor's Medal is given to individuals for exemplary and extraordinary service to the University. It is the University's highest honor.

Speaking on Tuesday, October 17, is William E. Bemis, a professor of biology. He is an expert in fish biology and evolution.

Speaking on Tuesday, November 27, is Madeleine Helena Blais, a professor of journalism. She is a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist.

Donald F. Towsley will be speaking on Wednesday, March 27. He is a professor of computer science. His work is focused on "multicasting" within computer networks.

Finally, N.J. Demerath, professor of sociology will be speaking on Wednesday, April 17. He has also published several books.

RA in John Adams tower is target of hate graffiti on door

By Jennifer Eastwood
Collegian Staff

Junior Legal Studies major Sharonda Williams, the Resident Advisor (RA) of the 10th floor of the John Adams tower in the Southwest living area, came home last Sunday night to news of defacement on her dorm room door with racial graffiti.

Williams had left for the weekend on Friday night for a visit to her home in New York. The graffiti, which is thought to have been written anywhere between late Friday night and early Saturday morning, had been taken off by the time she arrived back at her dorm.

Soon after her return, her Resident Director called Williams to tell her that "something" had been written on her door over the weekend, but it was through friends that Williams became aware of the exact message.

"Across the door, it said, 'You fucking slut,'" Williams explained. "Underneath that, it said, 'bitch,' and on the corner, it said, 'nigger'."

Williams said she has no idea as to who could have committed the hate crime but felt sure that it was not anyone living on her floor, remarking how even though she has only been the students' RA for three weeks, she can tell that the group is full of "good people" who would not commit such an act.

Yesterday, she held a floor meeting at 6:00 p.m. to inform all of her residents as to what had happened and ask the inevitable question of, "Did anyone see anything?"

While no one admitted to knowing any information on the crime, Williams made her intentions for the meeting clear.

"I'm definitely not accusing anyone on this floor," she said. "I just don't want it to happen to me again, and more importantly I don't want it to happen to you. I want you to feel safe on the floor."

Williams conveyed her feelings while attempting to lighten the mood a bit, discrediting the remarks of "bitch" (by saying "I mean, hey, I'm a nice person.") and "slut" (by saying "I don't know what they're talking about. I'm not easy.")

However, the room went from slight smiles resulting from her jesting attitude to total seriousness as she described how the term "nigger" truly disheartened her. "If it were just those other remarks," she said, "I wouldn't be contacting everyone, but 'nigger' is what really bothered me," she said, "I want to make sure that this does not happen again. This [UMass] is an institution of higher learning, and people should be able to feel safe here."

Williams told her residents she mainly wanted to find out who was responsible so that she could take legal action against them.

"Just keep your eyes open," she cautioned everyone.

Upon the end of the meeting, only a few of the residents' consoling remarks of "I'm so sorry," could be heard as the rest of the solemn-faced students shuffled out in an eerie silence.

Tomorrow Williams will meet with the UMass police to look at the pictures taken of the graffiti on Saturday and talk about what legal steps she can now take.

Later in the week, all RA's of the John Adams tower will meet to discuss the incident. Williams reported that ideas such as posting a bulletin board on hate crimes in the lobby of the tower and sending out a formal newsletter to residents will be on the agenda.

Williams said her last step in making people aware of this crime in hopes to end all hate crimes on campus is to try to contact the Chancellor and other administrative staff to see if anything else can be done.

Washington D.C. – This week, the Bush Administration plans to release proof that Osama bin Laden was behind the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, State Department officials and diplomatic sources said.

According to CNN, Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz will meet Thursday with NATO defense ministers in Brussels, Belgium, where he will present evidence linking bin Laden and his al Qaeda network to the attacks.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said Sunday that the United States would soon be able to publish a report explaining bin Laden's connection to the September 11 terrorist acts.

The defense ministers had been scheduled to meet September 30 in Naples, Italy, but the meeting date was moved up.

"Even if countries are willing to help, they need proof," one State Department official said, as sited in a CNN report. The meeting is part of the Bush administration's "public diplomacy" to gather support for an international coalition against terrorism, the official said.

Senior administration officials said they are sorting through intelligence they have collected to make sure "methods and sources" are not compromised when the United States releases the information to the public.

California – Over the past two weeks, gas prices have fallen about 2 cents, the first drop in a month.

Friday, the average price of gasoline, including all grades and taxes, was $1.54 a gallon, which is down 2.29 cents since Sept. 7 according to the Lundberg Survey of 8,000 stations nationwide.

In a report by CNN, analyst Trilby Lundberg said oil industry restraint and weak demand in the wake of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks were the reasons for the lower prices.

"People are not just canceling air travel, but travel period," Lundberg said. "The past several days of shock have grounded many customers."

Consequences of the attacks on the economy and lower gas consumption during fall and winter could keep prices falling," Lundberg said. "But prospects for the continued falling pump prices would crumble immediately if crude oil supply, especially from the Middle East, were to appear threatened."

After reaching record unadjusted highs in May, gas prices fell nearly 32 cents over the summer before they rose once more in late August and early September. The summer-long decrease was the result of refiners overproducing to avoid shortages during the summer driving season, Lundberg said.

Maryland – Two people were killed on the University of Maryland campus, as a powerful storm system moved through the Washington D.C. area Monday, bringing heavy rains and damaging winds.

Police had no further details about the deaths.

Winds tossed around cars, downed power lines and damaged construction trailers at the campus as a strong storm, possibly a tornado, passed through the area, police said.

At least four people were injured, according to the Prince George's County Fire Department, and one person was trapped in debris. Mark Brady, a spokesman for the fire department, said the injuries did not appear to be life threatening as sited in an article by CNN News.

Brady said there was heavy damage to trees and power lines were down, but the larger brick buildings on campus appeared to be intact. An apparent funnel cloud was also spotted in Beltsville, Maryland, just outside Washington D.C.

The National Weather Service said the area was under a tornado watch and tornado warnings were posted in several Virginia suburbs of the nation's capital.

Two people were injured at a trailer park as a tornado touched down around mid-afternoon Monday in rural northern Virginia, destroying a house and two trailers in Jeffersonton, about 60 miles from Washington D.C.

The storm knocked down power lines and trees and caused significant damage to other trailers as well. The first sighting was in Leon, about 30 miles away, at around 3:00 p.m.

New York - It's the second-to-last stop for the wreckage of the World Trade Center disaster. At the Fresh Kills Landfill on Staten Island, debris from the World Trade Center disaster is sorted, sifted, raked and sniffed through for clues.

"As the piles are being dropped off from the vehicles, they're spreading the material out fairly flat on the ground, and then the dogs are running through the piles looking for any remains they can identify," said Bruce Barton of Rescue International, which is helping oversee the canine recovery team according to CNN.

Trained noses help the trained eyes of the FBI, New York Police Department, Federal Aviation Administration and other investigators.

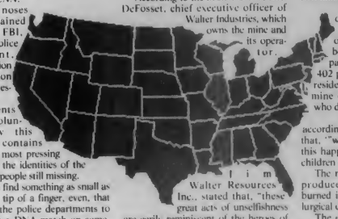
The agents and their volunteers know this debris contains answers, the most pressing of which are the identities of the thousands of people still missing.

"If we can find something as small as a finger or a tip of a finger, even, that could allow the police departments to hopefully get a DNA match on somebody. And that's going to allow closure for families," Barton said. "Little things tug hard at the humanity of the people responsible for this gruesome work."

"Today I found a woman's necklace. It was in the rubble — a small beautiful necklace," retired police officer Joseph Prainto told CNN. "What stays with me is that necklace was on somebody in the World Trade Center that day."

But little else is even worth saving. One pile contains crushed police cars and fire engines, said and unsalvageable.

In another spot are the thick steel beams that once held up the floors of the World Trade Center, now warped, severed and ready for burial.



The whole effort will take months. Of the 68,000 tons of debris already delivered to the site from Manhattan, only a third has been rummaged through.

"We're trying to do it as quickly as we possibly can," said James Luongo of the NYPD, according to CNN News. "I hear estimations from six months to a year. I don't know."

Alabama - After explosions rocked the nation's deepest coal mine, four miners died and nine who rushed in to help were missing and feared dead.

If the deaths of all 13 miners are confirmed, it would be the worst mining accident in the United States since 1984.

According to the Boston Globe, Don DeFosset, chief executive officer of Walter Industries, which owns the mine and its operator, Jim Walter Resources Inc., stated that, "these great acts of unselfishness are eerily reminiscent of the heroes of our Sept. 11 national tragedy. These men gave their lives to help others, just as the firefighters and police of New York did nearly two weeks ago."

Three of the dead and the nine missing remained more than 2,000 feet underground at Blue Creek No. 5 mine, company officials said.

On Sunday, at about 5:15p.m.,there was an explosion after a cave-in hit electrical equipment and ignited methane gas. At the time, 32 people were in the mine, six of them in the area of the explosion. Three of the six escaped, were hospitalized and remain in stable condition. The other three were left more than three miles from the main elevator, DeFosset said.

Ten miners went to rescue them, but something sparked a second, larger explosion about 45 minutes after the first, DeFosset said. One of ten miners who went in to rescue others was brought out but died at a hospital.

A second wave of rescue workers went into the mine and worked through the night but were unable to reach the area because of fires and methane gas, which is common in coal seams. Company officials said fires still burned Monday, and it was uncertain when a team would search again.

If the deaths are confirmed, it would be the worst loss of life since Dec. 19, 1984, when a faulty air compressor started a fire that killed 27 coal miners near Orangeville, Utah.

The Alabama mine is the deepest vertical shaft coal mine in North America, with operations at 2,140 feet beneath the surface, the company says. The mine employs 402 people. Nearly all of the 1,500 residents of Brookwood work in a mine or have relatives or friends who do.

Linda Barger, the town clerk, according to the Boston Globe, stated that, "we've never had anything like this happen before, there are a lot of children who are going to be affected."

The mine, which opened in 1978, produces low-sulfur coal that is burned in power plants and in metallurgical operations.

The explosion was the latest in a series of accidents for Jim Walter Resources. Last month, a construction worker was killed in a fall at a company coal processing facility.

The No. 5 Mine was also the site of a blast in 1993 in which four workers were seriously burned. It was closed in 1995 after "hot spots," or areas of spontaneous heating, were found in part of the mine.

Rhode Island - Former 'Survivor' winner Richard Hatch was sentenced to a year's probation Monday for domestic assault.

Hatch, 40, said he planned to appeal the ruling handed down by Newport County District Court Judge Robert K. Pirraglia.

"It's a ludicrous ruling, and I'm not sure what's behind the judge's personal reasons for it, but it's certainly not objective," Hatch told WPRO-AM radio.

Hatch's former boyfriend, Glenn Boyanowski, accused him of assaulting him last month. Hatch said the altercation, which took place on the front steps of his Middletown home, began when Boyanowski tried to push his way inside.

Hatch became a celebrity last year after he won $1 million on the CBS television show 'Survivor.' He is now a radio host for a Boston station.

Washington D.C. - Ninety percent of Americans approve of the way President Bush is handling his job after the Sept. 11 terror attacks, the highest rating for a president ever recorded by the Gallup polling group, USA Today and CNN reported today.

The 90 percent rating, measured in a poll of 1,005 adults on Friday and Saturday, outranks the previous record, a rating of 89 percent garnered by Mr. Bush's father, former President George Bush, at the end of the Persian Gulf War in 1991.

The current poll had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points, so the difference between the two approval ratings is statistically insignificant.

The younger Bush had an 86 percent rating in a survey conducted last week, just after terrorists slammed hijacked airplanes into the twin towers of the World Trade Center in Manhattan and into the Pentagon, outside Washington, leaving an estimated 6,800 people dead or missing. A fourth hijacked plane crashed in Pennsylvania.

President Bush ended the official mourning period today, presiding over a ceremony to hoist the American flag to full staff for the first time since the attacks.

According to the New York Times, the Gallup organization said the poll showed the highest presidential approval rating in the six decades it has been posing the question to Americans.

United Arab Emirates ends relation with Taliban

By Ken Campbell
Collegian Staff

As the nation recovers from its day of terror, America's new campaign to end global terrorism has gained a new ally.

The United Arab Emirates announced last week that it would end its relations with Afghanistan's ruling faction, the Taliban.

In an announcement late last week, the US State Department welcomed the move, which they see as another step to rooting out suspected terror mastermind Osama bin Laden, who is reportedly hiding under the protection of Taliban.

"The UAE's action today . . . constitutes further evidence that the international community of nations speaks with one voice on this issue," State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said. "Osama bin Laden and his terrorist associates threaten not just one state or several states, but rather civilization itself. We hope today's move by the UAE will lead the Taliban to recognize that it must immediately reinand Osama bin Laden to the appropriate authorities so that he may be arrested and effectively brought to justice."

The UAE was one of three world governments that recognized the Taliban, along with Pakistan and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. Saudi Arabia is reportedly thinking about severing ties.

Pakistan's Foreign Office spokesman, in a press conference shortly announced that they would continue to scale back ties to the Islamic fundamentalist regime, which controls about 90 percent of the country.

"As for Pakistan, we have been maintaining a skeleton staff in Kabul. Our Ambassador returned about a couple of months ago. After Sept. 11, as is normal in such situations, we decided to reduce our presence in Kabul," the spokesman said. "In Islamabad the Taliban representatives can listen to what the rest of the world is expecting of them. I may also add that . . . . the Pakistan Government asked the Taliban Embassy to scale down their presence, which they did."

Pakistan's reduced support and the UAE's severing of ties will impact Saudi Arabia's decision, political science professor Peter Haas said.

"It will exercise some pressure o n them to stop recognizing the Taliban. What mores important is if they let us use bases in their countries," Haas said. "The Europeans are more willing than the Middle Eastern governments: we've got no strong signals from the local governments as to the extent they'll go to support the US-led coalition."

That coalition also received a bolster of support from the Organization of American States. The network of North and South American countries invoked the Rio Treaty, a treaty of reciprocal assistance. The Rio Treaty provides for a collective response if a member state suffers an armed attack.

"Under its terms, an armed attack on one member is to be considered an attack on all," the State Department said in a released statement. "The treaty also provides for measures to address aggressions that are not armed attacks, as well as for extracontinental or intracontinental conflicts, or 'any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America'."

The Secretary of State, Colin Powell, addressing the representatives of the OAS, explained that the attack was not just against America but also against all the Americas.

"On Sept. 11, a grievous blow was visited upon our hemisphere and upon humanity. Yet it is not tragedy but unity, which brings us this day to the Organization of American States, unity of values, unity of interest, unity of purpose. Twenty-nine out of the 34 nations represented here today have citizens who were lost in the World Trade Center bombing last week. Families mourn from one end of this hemisphere to the other," Powell said.

"On behalf of President Bush and the American people, I want to extend our heartfelt thanks to you, our neighbors, for your outpouring of condolence and support, even as we extend to you our deepest sympathy for all those whom you yourselves have lost.

"President Bush and I have met with and talked to our counterparts all around the globe," Powell added.

"And the overwhelming message we are hearing is this: we are with you; terrorism is our common foe; we must act together against this international scourge, and against all who aid and abet it."

However, reports circulated by the Taliban government through the media that they had shot down an unmanned reconnaissance vehicle. Pakistan officials have also heard the rumor.

"We have also heard about this report that some helicopter or an actroplane was shot by the Taliban somewhere in north of Afghanistan," the Pakistan Foreign Office said in a released statement. "But we do not have any confirm reports whatever about this incident, which may or may not have taken place. But these are the claims, which we have seen in the media reports."

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, speaking to reporters outside NBC's "Face the Nation" confirmed that the United States has lost contact with one of its unmanned reconnaissance vehicle.

"The United States has in fact lost a- lost contac, I should say with an unmanned aerial vehicle," Rumsfeld said. "That happens from time to time in terms of the controls. We have no reason to believe it was shot down as the press is reporting."

The U.S. armed forces currently use two types of unmanned reconnaissance vehicles.

The U.S. Navy uses the Pioneer, a Reconnaissance, Surveillance and Targeting Acquisition (RSTA) vehicle. Equipped with multiple radars and sensors, the vehicle is based aboard amphibious transport ship.

The U.S. Air Force uses the Predator, a medium-altitude, long-endurance unmanned aerial vehicle system for reconnaissance and target acquisition.

The Secretary would not specify what type of vehicle was lost. Rumsfeld did, however, make one thing clear- the coalition that is building will be needed.

"Obviously, there's no way that one country could go about this task and think they could accomplish anything without the cooperation not just of other countries," Rumsfeld said. "But of people in countries that are like the Afghan people where we need their help in terms of providing information and intelligence."

SGA Senate Elections get in under the wire

By Kristin Shrewsbury
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association breathed a sigh of relief when it learned that seven percent of the students went to the polls in last Friday's Senate elections. If the SGA had not received at least five percent of the student vote, the elections would have been declared void.

Prior to Election Day, the Senate race posed early concerns, many regarding the possibility of a reoccurrence of problems like those of the previous year. Last year, the Senate was overturned and the entire Senate election was declared unconstitutional due to a lack of elections commissioners. The current members of the SGA Coordinating Council took measures to ensure that similar issues would not occur again.

SGA President John Sheehan and SGA Speaker Aaron Saunders guaranteed the elections to be smooth as well as run efficiently despite the lack of commissioners.

"We can guarantee that there will be two knowledgeable people at every table," Sheehan said.

Saunders expressed similar thoughts as well, by explaining that it's not the title that's important, it's that students have their voice and vote.

"Titles don't matter... and it's not a valid criticism against the SGA," Saunders said. "We have a job to do and it should not be impended due to procedural issues. It's important to look at the reality of the situation and the fact that we have a job to do."

Sheehan and Saunders both expressed prior to Election Day that the SGA did not have the tools to hold a fully commissioned election based mainly on a lack of Area Governments. Area Governments supply the elections committee with one individual from each living area on campus; however, due to area governments in flux this did not occur.

Aside from concerns of an repeat of last year, the elections have proven to be successful thus far. With all but a few vacancies, mainly under the Commuter district, the SGA Senate is looking towards holding it's first official meeting on October 3.

"I was confident that we would get the five percent student vote needed, and we got seven percent," Saunders said. "I think it went well considering it was a Friday, and the elections were quick, so I think it's excellent."

The election ballot contained three referendum questions requesting student's opinions on a variety of issues, which directly affect the University of Massachusetts.

The first asked students if they supported surveillance cameras being placed on dormitories as well as various locations on the UMass campus. 311 students voted for cameras, but 811 voted against them.

Referendum question number two asked students if they would approve an increase of $3 on their Student Activities Fee. This would increase the yearly fee up to $78. Students voted for the fee increase with a vote of 702 students in favor and 386 against.

The third referendum question called for students to vote on the SGA Constitutional By-Laws regarding the recently changed two electoral districts, On-Campus Residential and Commuter. The SGA Coordinating Council ratified this question prior to the elections based on a unanimous decision made by last years Senate.

"I think the question was rather confusing, but students voted to keep the three district system," Saunders said.

Due to the former three districts system (On-Campus Residential, On-Campus Nonresidential and Commuter) the SGA faced numerous issues regarding seat apportionments in the past, in particular with the Greek system. Saunders explained that the SGA and the Administration agreed to keep the Greek area in the Commuter district and that On-Campus Nonresidential would be kept to UMass owned housing only.

"We needed the students opinion and the problem has already been solved," Saunders said. "I've talked to Javier Cevallos [Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs] and were all in agreement that the Greeks are in the Commuter district and there is more than enough evidence to support this. Now we can all breath a sigh of relief and put this behind us and move on."

The Elections which are supposed to be ratified within 48 hours of the elections has yet to occur, but is scheduled to be done this Wednesday at the SGA's final Coordinating Council meeting.

"It's important for the Senators to remember, especially the incoming freshman, to understand that even though infighting is attractive at times and easy to get caught up in, that they weren't elected to be apart of it," Saunders said. "They were elected to come into this position and make a difference within the undergraduate student body and I have faith that students will see a difference in this years Senate."

The newly elected Senate will be meeting for a two-day orientation in order to prepare for the up and coming year as well. The first Senate meeting is set to take place on Oct. 3 in the Campus Center at 7:00 p.m.

No. 23 returns: for right reasons

Today, it should be official. After three years of retirement, the Washington Post reported Sunday that Michael Jordan will make a comeback this season with the Washington Wizards, and it is expected to come over the wire by fax today.

Why come back? Why not? Jordan's comeback this season is for reasons so pure at heart that it's hard to fault the man for trying it. It's not for the money, as Jordan is expected to sign a one-year league-minimum contract. For veterans in the league with at least 10 years of service, that is one million dollars, less than three percent of what Jordan made in his last year with the Chicago Bulls in 1997-1998. It's a drop in the bucket, considering the millions he has made already in the business world.

It's not for the prestige. Regardless of how well Jordan performs overall, he's going to have his bad nights. He probably has not played on a team as bad as the Wizards are right now since the 1980's, when the Bulls regularly got swept out of the playoffs in the early rounds or (GASP) missed the postseason altogether. No matter how good Jordan is this season, he's playing on a team that won 19 times in 82 games last year. The odds aren't with him there.

Jordan is going back for the simplest and realistically, most sappy reason there is. It's for the "love of the game," something that we've all heard said so many times that it's sickening. There's really nothing else that can be said, though. Plain and simple, Jordan is coming back because he misses it too much and he wants another challenge. He's been playing in controlled scrimmages for months now, and he can't deal with playing without a scoreboard and 15,000 people watching anymore.

Love it or hate it, a fair share of America will be watching Jordan this winter. It's the story in basketball this year, bigger than any title defense or rags-to-riches story that the NBA can provide us. They are plenty of Jordan-haters, and that's fine. Everyone doesn't need to be a fan. Every time Allen Iverson or Kobe Bryant slices by Jordan for a lay-up or steals the ball from him, they're will be people dancing on his grave. Expect it.

What we need to remember, though, is that Jordan is now 38 years old. His kids are closer to our age than he is, and he's probably going to have a rough go of it at times next year. In all of those scrimmages that so rekindled Jordan's competitive fire, he managed to crack two ribs, and come up with back spasms, knee tendinitis, and hamstring troubles. That shows he's aging. At times he's going to look like, well, a 38 year-old. He'll spend a substantial amount of time on the court this year with his new draft pick, Kwame Brown. Brown is 20 years younger. That says it all.

Give him a shot, sports fans. At times Jordan will look like the genius he always was. There will also be times, however, when he looks like an aging hall-of-famer. Much like Patrick Ewing, Charles Barkley and Hakeem Olajuwan have in the past few years, there are going to be times when Jordan just looks plain old. The question is: how frequent are those times? You don't have to root for him, but at least respect the decision. If it's true, Jordan is coming back because he's still got a little fight left in him. That should be reason enough to justify it to anyone.

No time for sabre rattling

SIMON PONGRATZ

As all must unfortunately remember, September 11 saw the most terrible terrorist attack on the US in history. Words like "Challenger" and "JFK" spewed from Peter Jennings rambling mouth to describe the feeling and behind him, the images of the awful scenes scarred the mind.

The whole day seemed a trip down the rabbit hole into a surreal dreamland.

Classes were cancelled, so I tried to go about my normal business: but I, as well as everyone else, seemed to have settled into a shock-like coma. I walked around the sidewalks, looking around and feeling united with everyone, as if we were brothers in arms. In the evening I thought that life seemed so much easier before 9:00 AM.

Indeed, one of the most recurring words was "war," which was on everyone's lips. War against whom, and with what objectives, nobody at first said. Names were thrown out, eventually settling on Osama bin Laden. Then they implicated Iraq. Not surprising. So it will be a war of punishment. And a brutal punishment it should be.

January 28, 1986 and November 22, 1963 did not come to my mind while watching the terrible footage on the news. After listening to the talk around campus, I felt like it was Sarajevo on June 28, 1914. All summer and even earlier, there has been a feeling of electricity in the air, like a massive build-up of energy and angst. Now the floodgates have been opened, and the way people are talking, the only emotion I feel is fear. We must be very, very careful, lest we follow the second Reich into ruin and repeat the postwar words of Bethmann-Hollwegg: "Ah, if we had only known."

While everyone is under agreement as to what should be done, no one knows quite how to go about doing it. Despite the urging of Pentagon generals, Colin Powell has ruled out an attack on Iraq for fear of destroying the fragile coalition they've built up with the Arab countries. Our tactics will be subtle, silent and unknown to the demos. It will be a very dirty war, during which we shall become what we have beheld.

But despite this talk of a secret war, the US and England have amassed a force not seen since World War II. This includes 680 warplanes, 3,500 cruise missiles, 3,000 British marines, at least one nuclear submarine, giant B-52 bombers and four carrier battle groups, along with thousands of support troops. They're all moving toward the Persian Gulf to engage the enemy that President Bush so broadly defined. Is it just me, or does it seem like we're making it very, very easy for us to begin dealing with all problems with saber rattling? I like that phrase, even though it seems to imply bluffing, which we of course aren't. With his 90% approval rating (apparently higher than any other president) and our thirst for revenge, things could get out of hand very quickly.

This is why I made the reference to 1914. No doubt due to the horror of the attacks, it seems to me that people began crying for war very quickly, and with very little thought to what that would mean. It is a war, and one in which no quarter will be given. But our enemy must be clearly defined, and here it is not. The President basically left it open for us to attack almost any country we please, if they don't respond to our demands to our satisfaction. According so far to what he's said, one can only be "with" or "against" us. And for those against us, we will back up our demands with force and the support of 90% of our people.

We must be very, very careful, lest we follow the second Reich into ruin and repeat the postwar words of Bethmann-Hollwegg: "Ah, if we had only known."

In the words of my esteemed finance professor, "Bin laden is a dead man." He must have known that an attack of such magnitude would leave no other options, which should give the authorities pause. Was it the big one, or the first of many, already planned and set to occur no matter what happens to those who financed them? How long will the threat of an attack hang over our heads? On Sunday the FBI grounded all crop dusting planes for the second time since September 11, along with the second major warning by the feds that another attack may be imminent.

It only took a few days for people to realize that there could be no massive invasion of Afghanistan. The officer corps of our military is too mindful of the lessons of Vietnam, and they must also know that the last army to successfully march into Afghanistan belonged to Alexander the Great. Notable failures include the British (who lost everyone of a force almost 20,000 strong—except for one doctor) and the Soviets.

So what will be done? Those who last week were talking of the brave (and fearsome) new world we are now in may be more right than they know. On Sunday, reports were surfacing everywhere about national identification cards. Tony Blair has agreed to allow the issuing of cards to every citizen with "photograph and thumbprint digitized and embedded in the ID card." To assuage fears about these Nazi-like measures, the cards will be voluntary. This seems nice, until one learns that holding a card will be necessary for "boarding an aircraft, buying gas, opening a bank account, starting a job, or claiming government benefits."

President Bush is also considering these measures, though at the time of this writing he has not made a decision and seems to dislike the idea. One would think that such a devout Christian would have trouble turning himself into the Beast of Revelation. But now anything is possible.

What are we willing to give up, and what will we become, in the name of security and revenge? On a drive to Cornell to visit a friend, signs reading "fry 'em all" and "Guns: the terrorist repellent" dotted the highway, reflecting the national outlook. At times like these (as if there ever have been), we must be, above all, patient, and consciously ask ourselves what kind of people we are that make up this nation.

"Celling" me on a mobile phone

MELODY ZAGAMI

"I think we should get you a cell phone." That's a direct quotation taken from my mother last week. After the countless stories about people reaching their loved-ones during last Tuesday's tragedy my mom decided that she would feel safer if I could be reached anytime, anywhere.

I don't take kindly to advances in technology. I don't have an AOL account, I still listen to Def Leppard albums in my car's tape deck for crying out loud. I loathe cellular phones. I see 12 year-olds at the mall using them and I want to push them off the escalator. My friends have been begging me for four years now to move into the 21st century and I have refused to do so time and time again. They call each other when we're at parties:

"Hey do you have to go to the bathroom?"

"Yeah, I totally do."

Conversations like these cause me to hang my head in embarrassment and further my opposition to ever owning a "celly" (I believe that's what the kids are calling them).

I dislike cell phones for so many reasons. I have never understood why I would have to be reached while waiting in line at the Stop and Shop or sitting in traffic. It seems to me, that they are a pointless accessory, something that will just complicate my life further. My best friend always says I need one because I can call people when I'm bored. I'm never bored. When I get bored I rerun old episodes of Soul Train in my head or wonder why "Friends" is still on the air. But still, through all this, I sunk into hypocrisy this weekend and I sold out.

Selling out wasn't as easy as I thought it would be though. I figured purchasing a cell phone would be as easy as buying a real phone. You go into a store you see a phone you like for a good price and you give the cashier money. No, no friends, buying a cell phone with a calling plan is about as easy purchasing an automobile or adopting a child. I have never been presented with so many options or products in my life.

Good God, you'd think I was in the market for a new organ or something.

All week my mother had been researching phone plans. Companies offer different packages for different areas of calling and features. She found a Verizon package at Radio Shack that she liked, but I figured we should review all the options, pick up some literature and check out what the mall had to offer. So we go to the mall. I figured there'd be one of those little kiosk things in the middle with a fairly knowledgeable cell phone peddler to answer me some questions, learn me some cell phone jargon, and I'd be able to make my decision from that. Pretty simple. No, no it's not simple at all. There are, in fact, 5 different cell phone stores at any given mall. Not just little carts with cell phones, but whole stores dedicated to retailing small, hand held, portable wastes of money.

I am a consumer by nature. I like to buy stuff and I usually count on advertising to help me make my choices. Most cellular phone marketing is poorly done. "Voice Stream," which I believe used to be called "Sprint," is promoted by Jamie Lee Curtis. I respect Curtis; she was in the first "Halloween" and "A Fish Called Wanda." But is she going to sell me a phone? Voice Stream has a number of calling plans, all with clever names such as, "Get more," and "Get more, plus." Automatically this makes me think of sex. So if I sign up for one of the "Get more" plans, do I get more? No, it turns out that this just means I get more options with my calling plan or something. You should have seen the look on the Voice Stream guy's face when I asked. They also have less attractively named packages like, "Family Time" and "Ping-Pong." I don't really need to talk to my family any more than I already do, and I've never enjoyed ping-pong. They should've called it badminton, that's a plan I would've bought. I decided against Jamie Lee and her Voice Stream empire.

"I dislike cell phones for so many reasons. I have never understood why I would have to be reached while waiting in line at the Stop and Shop or sitting in traffic."

My next plan of action was to try AT&T. They're a large corporation that has been in the telephone business as far back as the dawn of the rotary dial, so I figured I might have better luck. AT&T's options are all kind of expensive. However, they are offering exclusive Salt Lake 2002 Olympic paraphernalia. So you might be paying top dollar to talk to your brother in Philly, but you do get a pin. Also, all the AT&T phones are either awesome (but they cost $150 bucks) or they're free (after rebate) and suck. The guys that run the stands always have the $150.00 phone hanging off one of their belt loops. And they'll remove it from the belt loop, hold it up to you and say, "This little baby, I could not live without." I can't really afford the Cadillac of cell phones, so I moved on.

Cingular was the next stop. I know nothing about cingular except that their spokes-icon is a little orange thing that kind of resembles a little rubber orange man. Cingular's plans are competitively priced with Verizon, but they have the orange man. They also have a thousand pamphlets detailing the various plans and options you can get. At this point I was beginning to feel nauseous and had to take a seat on a mall bench, next to a grandpa waiting for his wife to exit Sears. Cingular text messaging allows you to send a little email to anyone who has the same service as you (which is probably no one). The pamphlet example shows one phone that reads, "I just ordered pizza." Then the phone at the bottom of the page reads, "I'll be there in 30 minutes." I hardly see how this is accurate. What if the pizza takes 20 minutes or you've ordered it form Amherst Dominos and it take three working days?

In the end, it turned out that mom was right (as usual). I went into Radio Shack, got a Motorola 2233000 Million Z, or something with a Verizon plan. Hey, why not give them all of my money, I already give them 70 percent anyway. I now place myself among the cellularly-abled, but not without a bit of equivocation or shame. If you see me talking on the phone while in line at the Blue Wall, please hit me over the head with it.

Everything you ever wanted to know about socks...

By Shauna Billings
Collegian Staff

In this time of national unity, there is one issue still dividing our great nation. It's not about political ideologies, or religious affiliations, or even of socio-economic differences. It's all about socks.

No, really - it's true.

The vast majority of students at UMass are from the Northeast, where our stockinged feet are pretty much all the same. Sure, some may get all Euro and wear their Italian loafers sockless, while others prefer to wear multi-colored hiking socks with their Birkenstocks all fall. But at least, for the most part, we all agree that socks just have no place pulled up to the knee.

But in other parts of the country, actually in most other parts of the country, things are very different. Take for example my friends Kerri and Brian, who went on a trip to Florida. They had a great time, but they had the terrible misfortune to arrive in Disneyland on the day of a National Cheerleading Competition. To some 1,000 cheerleaders would be a gift from heaven, and to others all those cheerleaders would be nothing short of torture. But their tales of cheerleaders wearing white and striped athletic socks pulled mid-calf opened my eyes to what I like to call the Regional Sock Quandary.

The Regional Sock Quandary is basically how socks are worn in two general areas of the United States: 1. Here (aka - the Northeast) and 2. Everywhere else (aka – everywhere else). In New England, we tend to laugh at the rather goofy pictures of our dads playing basketball in striped gym socks pulled up to their knees. We like our socks short and/or pushed low to the sneaker. Visions of tourists fill our minds when we think tall socks. However in other parts of the country, whether it is merely a trend or a way of life, tall socks are in.

I've heard tell from students from other parts of this nation that our parents' generation of socks (the sport socks, affectionately called "Yankee Socks." (Please note the similarity to Boston's favorite chant, "Yankees Suck.") Except for us crazy Yankees, a big portion of the United States, including the aforementioned hordes of cheerleaders, pull their socks very high and chuckle at our tendency to keep our socks low.

The vision of 1,000 cheerleaders, often the "popular" (please hold back any sniffs of dissent or approval) and outgoing students of a high school, pulling their socks very high puzzles me on many levels.

Puzzlement One – Since big advocates of high pulled socks often come from the South and California – places that are often warm – how do they deal with the hideous sock tan lines? A few days in the sun with those high-pulled puppies, and you couldn't wear sandals the rest of the summer. If anything, we of the harsh Northern climates should be the ones singing the praises of high socks, because not only is it typically chilly here for most of the year, but our skin generally has a rather sickly pallor compared to those of the South – so the tan isn't that noticeable anyway. Then again, we have to jump at our two-month window of tanning opportunity, so we don't want anything, least of all our socks, to stand in the way.

Puzzlement Two – Where in the world did this trend come from? Certainly not New York, The U.S. fashion capital that seems to share our view in the issue of the regional sock quandary. What would possess Southerners, West Coasters and Midwesterners to kkk it 70's gym class style. And why tThank God!! weren't we invited to the party?

I guess it's kind of humbling that when we show up in other parts of the country, they snicker about our socks. We're always so full of ourselves up here in the north - going full speed at all times – not talking the time to say hello to a stranger or grab a cup of coffee with a neighbor. We bare our calves instead of our souls – unlike the more laid-back areas of the country.

You really won't see much of the sock phenomenon at this point in the school year in the Northeast. Students wear their tall socks for a few days, but are hit with such vehement contempt for their sporty old school style, that all but the strongest believers in knee sock style crack beneath the intense pressure. By this point of the year, we Northeasterners have broken the stocking spirits of out-of-staters, and soon cold weather will set upon us, and bared knees will go into hibernation until May.

In some matters of socks, there is a national fashion consensus. For women, funky tights are very big this fall. Everything from bright colors to fishnets to openwork lace tights are being shown with all of this falls skirts. Depending on the length of your skirt, adjust the openwork of the tights accordingly. A mini skirt with fishnets makes a young lady, to the words of my Granny, look like a hussy. However pair those fishnets with a knee length or nearly knee length skirt and some color high boots – and you've got a statement. You can extend the seasonability of mini skirts by pairing a short skirt with thicker non-lace tights for the school girl look (just make sure the fabric of the skirt works with tights – generally chiffons, pastels and other summery skirts look out of place with woolen tights. H & M, at the Holyoke Mall, is selling a wide array of very cool tights – including both large and small openwork fishnets in a variety of colors, heavyweight tights, as well as lacey and zigzagged tights.

As for other sock news – while white socks are always a classic with a pair of sneakers (but not generally with other shoes) why not live it up a little and buy some patterned socks to wear with your other shoes? Crazy socks always liven life up, and bring a little spark to your day, even when you can't see them. Since ninth grade, aside from my running socks (the aforementioned "Yankee socks") and two very respectable pairs of black socks worn while working at the State House, I haven't owned any plain socks at all. My socks range from the more tame – striped, argyle and multi-colored hiking socks, to the insane – appliqued fuzzy llamas, glittery toed and margarita socks. My high school English teacher, Mrs. Cooper, used to ask me when I'd grow out of wearing those wacky socks. Well, now in my last year of college, I'm still going strong. And I'd just like to point out that silly socks are rather popular now – even top designers make them! While most of the time my boots cover the socks, they always bring me a very faint hint of happiness when I kick my shoes off at night. Just a quick fashion tip – the sock should be darker than the pant, with the exceptions of when wearing jeans, or when being Michael Jackson.

So, whatever your sock style – crazy lobster socks, low rise Yankee socks or fishnet tights – have fun with a functional article of clothing that has been drab and ignored for so long. And please, be kind to those wearing knee-high gym socks. I think that there might be more of them than us in this country, and even though we may think it looks wussy, they could probably take us.

And P.S. – For the whole of the UMass community, once and for all I'd like to set the record straight. Last year, someone NOT affiliated with Style File wrote that khaki pants and black shoes was a major fashion faux pas. I've been stopped by numerous people and even got coffee with a guy last year who attributed (at times angrily attributed) this statement to me. Ah, to be remembered for something that you didn't actually write. I wear khakis and black shoes all the time, so stop throwing me looks when you see me on campus. Khaki and black is NOT a fashion faux pas, unless you're one of those seriously deluded fashionistas who would change her nail polish to accent her gym clothes if the polish she were already wearing clashed with her sports bra. Black can be worn with khaki or light brown. It should not be worn if the brown is medium to deep to chocolate colored. Brown shoes would then be worn in the black ones stead. Thank you – my little style file self can now rest easy at night...a weight has been lifted from my shoulders.

The Regional Sock Quandry... Are tall socks really the fashion?

Boston recognizes women artists

By Genevieve Butler
Tufts Daily (Tufts U.)

(U-WIRE) MEDFORD, Mass. - As students around Boston begin their fall semesters, a new exhibition from the Museum of Fine Arts (MFA) serves to inspire, provoke, and encourage the continuing local tradition of women in the arts.

A Studio of Her Own: Women Artists in Boston 1870-1940, the MFA's latest major exhibition, is dedicated exclusively to the work of local female artists of varied media. The featured time period saw the openings of both the MFA and the Museum School's (SMFA). The former's launch of the 1887 The Work of Women Etchers of America exhibit was the first of its kind in America, and established the foundation for a lasting relationship between female artists and the MFA.

The era also saw the easing of social restrictions on artistic training for women. While it was previously considered improper for women to practice life derivative techniques, female artists of the era were permitted or encouraged to pursue education in art.

The exhibition's many portraits and objects allude to these constraints and inequities in their obvious foreign influences. "Roses-Souvenir de Viller le bel," a small oil on panel painting by Sarah Wyman Whitman, is one of the first to greet visitors in the gallery. With her strikingly modernist palate, the painting reveals the French influences the artist gained while training abroad. Paris also provided critical opportunities for the portrait painter Lois Mailou Jones, whose "Portrait of Hudson" (1932) showcases her technical mastery. Jones thus became known as one of the most prominent black women artists of her day.

A Studio of Her Own endeavors to present a diverse picture through the collected objects and their respective creators. Two plaster casts - "Bust of a Woman" (1913), and "Head of a Man" (1913), by Meta Vaux Warrick Fuller (both partial casts for the larger "Emancipation") - provide a rare example of a black woman's work which is on permanent display in Boston. Finally cast last year, "Emancipation" now stands in Harriet Tubman Square in Boston's South End.

Anna Vaughn Hyatt, whose portrait by Marion Boyd Allen hangs in view at the exhibition's entrance, is another of this small community. Her "Joan of Arc" (1915-1918) was commissioned for a Gloucester World War I memorial, a miniature of which she is seen at work on in Allen's painting. The painting and the smaller of Hyatt's sculptures, "Reaching Jaguar" (1906), illustrate the artist's concentration and expertise. This smaller work appears compositionally radical in comparison to the larger, more traditional "Emancipation."

Known for her expertise in the rendering of animals, Hyatt captures the movement of the jaguar in a manner achievable only through hours of careful observation.

The photographs of Mary Devens and Sarah Choate Sears also display this meticulousness, though they differ greatly in other respects. With her "Charcoal Effect (Portrait of Charles Hopkinson)" (1900), Devens celebrates the artist's hand in its "hand drawn" aesthetic. Conversely, Sears employs stark contrast in her series of portraits, primarily of children.

Their innovations of photographic processes during the medium's infancy display the technical mastery and daring break with tradition that attracted the attention of renowned photographer Alfred Steiglitz. Especially in light of their vast differences, that the work of these two artists was recognized in New York again exemplifies the proliferation of artwork by women in Boston during this era.

The show is dominated by paintings, however, featuring artists such as Polly (Ethel R.) Thager, Ellen Day Hale, and Gertrude Fiske. Female painters in Boston were instrumental in the establishment of tradition and the cultivation of the "Boston School" of

Cake – likes oysters and Guinness

By Nadine Dabby
Daily Californian (U. California-Berkeley)

(U-WIRE) BERKELEY, Calif. –

Daily Californian: How do you feel about Guinness and oysters?

Vince Di Fiore: I like oysters a lot and I like Guinness a lot and they are both robust and flavorful treats.

DC: What drew you to perform at the Guinness and Oyster Festival this weekend?

VD: I don't know, I couldn't honestly tell you, other than a couple of the band members live in the East Bay and it's always nice to play a free show in the park in your home town.

DC: Aren't you guys from Sacramento?

VD: We are from Sacramento. Now two people live in the East Bay, two people live in Sacramento and one person lives in Los Angeles.

DC: Sounds like you guys have to travel a lot.

VD: We do a lot of traveling. We alternate between Sacramento and Oakland (for rehearsals).

DC: How long have you been together?

VD: We've been together for 10 years. It was a very gradual process getting to where we are right now, but we were aided by radio hits like "Rock and Roll Lifestyle," "The Distance" and "Never there."

DC: Has your music grown and changed over that time?

VD: It hasn't changed that much, it's grown because we've grown as musicians and as record producers.

DC: In what way?

VD: Learning how to use a studio to our advantage and learning how to have more confidence with arrangements. Learning how to work with other people better.

DC: What about your album covers?

VD: We had the "do it yourself" ethic in this band and John has always designed the album covers. When we got into our contract with Capricorn and with our new label Columbia, both of them have an appreciation for the album cover art.

DC: How involved is each of the members of the band in coming up with the music?

VD: In terms of the lyrics, John writes all of the lyrics, he's our songwriter. He's really the best song writer among us and everyone else - we all collaborate on arrangements.

DC: What do you have to say about your unique style - does it say who you are as people?

VD: I suppose it does. It says that we are aware of American musical history, aware of the current political climate and aware that there is sometimes danger in too much excess.

DC: And yet the songs are so simple.

VD: Yeah I guess that might be true. I'm not sure about that. I'll let you comment on that instead of me.

DC: This is a very important question - for how long has John had that guitar?

VD: That's actually his mother's guitar. I think she used to sing and play that guitar to him when he was a kid.

DC: Does he have other guitars?

VD: He does. He has one other acoustic guitar that is a hack-up for that one guitar and he has other electric guitars that we never see, he brings them around every once in a while for kicks.

DC: What kind of a girl is a girl who wears a short skirt with a long jacket?

VD: It's sort of a metaphor. It's just like when you call a boat a girl - you refer to a ship as "she" - that's what the girl in the song is. It's not a ship but some other thing in life.

DC: Really?

VD: It's not surprising that people would take that song literally because that's how it's written, but it refers to a deeper yearning which is the undercurrent of American life. It makes it a more interesting song doesn't it?

DC: All of your songs seem to have to do with one of two things - girls or cars - why is that?

VD: It's just what everyone has in common. Everyone has in common relationships involving love and the car is a universal symbol for freedom, so they are good song topics.

DC: So are you more into cars or girls?

VD: I'm more into girls - that's an easy question.

DC: Do you ever compare your self to other bands?

VD: Not really.

DC: How about being influenced by other bands?

VD: I think Led Zeppelin is probably the biggest influence in this band. I think I just realized that this week.

DC: What happened?

VD: I guess we were listening to "Dancing Days" on Houses of the Holy, and I realized what a big influence Led Zeppelin has been on Cake.

DC: In what way?

VD: The hooks, a lot of the guitar hooks. The arrangements aren't overbearing, there's room for all the instruments in the arrangements.

DC: How would you describe your music?

VD: I'd call it high impact, easy listening.

DC: What does that mean?

VD: It means that it's accessible to a lot of people, but there is still some modern meaning to it.

DC: Why did you call "Arco Arena" by that name?

VD: Because it sounds like prog rock and that type of music you usually hear in a basketball arena.

DC: What inspires you to cover songs like "I Will Survive?"

VD: It was a well-written song that works well in any style.

DC: Even though it was originally written and sung by a woman?

VD: That's, I think, what made it really interesting, is that there is a man instead of women singing it. I guess it's just sometimes you can get new meaning from the same material. Words have many meanings - the same word has many meanings so if the same words are said by a different person with a different tone of voice, then a new message is created.

DC: What message do you want to send to your listeners?

VD: I think that life is both emotional and interesting.

Nevermind remains on our minds

By Jack Bullion
Daily Skiff (Texas Christian U.)

(U-WIRE) FORT WORTH, Texas - The way the world listened to rock music changed forever Sept. 13, 1991 - perhaps slightly unbeknownst to most of us. On that day, Nirvana's album Nevermind, a reasonably well-received collection of 12 raw, powerful punk songs, was released.

Not many people noticed at first, but as the album's opening track "Smells Like Teen Spirit" slowly seared itself into the heads of angst-ridden teens, sending them into spasms of violent air guitar playing or, at worst, self-directed mosh pits, they began to catch on to the rugged charms of an album that little less than a year ago, was ranked behind the Beatles' Revolver by VH-1 on its list of greatest rock albums of all time.

It's hard to think of another rock album having quite the impact that Nevermind had on the lives of those in the generation that were too young to fit into Generation X.

The change in the hallways of middle schools across America was nothing short of drastic. One day, teens were roaming the halls, quoting Sir Mix-A-Lot, the next, they were wearing T-shirts with naked babies swimming after dollar bills and acting much more disaffected and surly.

"There was something different about it, something new and exciting," said Johnny Ferraro, a Texas Christian University senior psychology major. "Radio was all 'Whoomp (There It Is)', Janet Jackson and some big butt song dominating the charts. Then this punk band came along."

To put it mildly, Nevermind redefined rock music. It clawed violently to the surface in a sea of hair-metal and synth rock, which lingered like bad leftovers that the 1980s had neglected to throw out of the fridge. Nevermind made it cool to pick up guitars and just shred, to call on all the cathartic power of a wall of noise that some genres may attempt, but only rock music seems to understand - every once in awhile at least.

Indeed, the rock radio landscape changed as a new music called "grunge" exploded behind the reluctant lead of Nirvana, giving us Pearl Jam, Soundgarden and Stone Temple Pilots. Rock music actually seemed important again, suffused with a meaning and purpose it had been without for years. More than anything, it may have been the message - defiance, introspection and anger, all burbling noticeably beneath the furious rock - that truly cemented Nevermind as a cultural and generational pivot point.

Andy Rice, a junior marketing major, said the album struck a particular chord with adolescents at the time, who are now today's college students.

"It came out right around the time when we were starting to develop our own personalities, and we didn't want what our parents or older siblings listened to," Rice said.

Nevermind gave that generation its first icon: Kurt Cobain, the gifted but tortured songwriter, possessor of not only a rail-thin voice that seemed on the verge of shattering every time he let loose a bloodcurdling scream, but also of a tragically intimate knowledge of every sort of anguish known to humanity. His suicide in 1994 robbed many teens of a hero, as well as a defining musical voice.

"I remember going to junior high the day after he died, and all my friends were crying," Ferraro said. "They had found someone to latch onto, and they were just devastated."

So in its weird, defiant, alienated way, Nevermind touched a generation, subtly weaving itself into the fabric of life. In the heated debates about whether or not "Polly" was really about rape. In the impromptu mosh pits conducted at middle school mixers, high school dances and even proms when the disc jockey made the mistake of playing "Smells Like Teen Spirit." The first time someone took up the guitar, they learned "Come As You Are" within five minutes.

Ten years later, the rock landscape since the audacious arrival of Nevermind has changed. From Nirvana's innovation came imitation, and the sound-alikes queued up to fire off salvos at one-hit wonderdom. Grunge music turned out to have a little less staying power than we expected it to, with the breakup of Soundgarden, the retreat into artistry and intimacy of Pearl Jam, and the sudden demise of, well, pretty much everybody who combined loud volume and anger with something resembling intelligence.

Even Nirvana faded somewhat. The band's music, considered such an appropriate soundtrack for its particular cultural moment, began to lose its luster as the moment passed.

In the minds of many, the legacy of Nevermind still exists, in spite of its passage from living document to historical one. They continue to dive back into the pool, like the kid on the cover, discovering and rediscovering exactly why it was so darned important. And they also continue to crank up the radio a couple of notches when they hear those four muted, jolting power chords, followed by that guttural drum roll, that signals the giddy fury of "Smells Like Teen Spirit."

"In that period of cheesy and crappy eighties music, thank God (Nirvana) came along," Rice said. "They changed music. Who knows what it'd be like without them?"

art. This school subscribed to elegance, propriety, and refinement with a minimum of social commentaries or political content. This school of painting, which focused on domestic still-life paintings and portraits, used extensive color and, similar to the Dutch interior painters, often enshrouded the painting's subject in the bright light of a window. Even those women who defied the conventions of the school, however, still left lingering remnants of this training in their work.

Although for some painters, succeeding within the conservatism of the era was the main key to the advancement of women in the Boston artistic community, the work of Gertrude Fiske insists otherwise. Her brilliant colors and images of powerful, self assured women decidedly break from social conventions - they are pictured without children, and on a formal level. Of her most unusual paintings, "Revere Beach, Winter" (1930) captures the desolate, surreal landscape of the abandoned amusement park during its off-season. The imagery is stark and foreboding, and captures the eerie carnavalesque aesthetic usually associated with more contemporary work.

"The Window" (1916), also creates a similar feeling of isolation and desolation despite its images of figures in a room bathed in light. The painting's three women sit, in close proximity to each other, but in apparent silence and solitude. None of the three address the voyeur of each other. The colors are brilliant, yet the environment is dark and shadowy. As seems the reality for Boston women artists at the time, the mood of the work is mixed: there is the boldness and brilliance of the color and technique coupled with the isolation of the figures.
